PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 30, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Myers	Sheppard
Bankhead	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Sherman
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Simmons
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Kendrick	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Fernald	Kenyon	Page	Smoot
Fletcher	Kirby	Penrose	Swanson
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Ransdell	Trammell
Harding	McKellar	Robinson	Underwood
Hollis	McNary	Saulsbury	Vardaman

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent on account of death in his family. I take this occasion to make with deep regret the very painful announcement that Mrs. Walsh, the beloved wife of my esteemed colleague, died this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GERRY, Mr. HALE, Mr. HUSTING, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. KNOX, Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. SHAFTO, Mr. STERLING, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. WILLIAMS answered to their names when called.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent by reason of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on official business, and that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is also detained on official business.

Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I wish also to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. LODGE, Mr. JAMES, and Mr. GRONNA entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent to have recommitted to the Committee on Commerce the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes. The committee have agreed to recommend certain changes in the bill, and I move that it be recommitted for the purpose of having those changes made.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERMAN:

A bill (S. 2831) to prohibit any citizen of the United States of America from accepting, without the consent of the Congress of the United States, any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State or Government; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 2832) granting an increase of pension to John L. Rushton (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to see if it is possible at this time to come to any agreement as to a final vote upon the bill. I have in mind not later than 4 o'clock on Monday next. Of course, I do not desire to take up time in calling the roll of the Senate if it is made manifest that there would be objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on yesterday, at a very late hour, the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, presented an amendment radically changing the whole plan of the war-profits tax as submitted to the Senate when this bill was reported. I thereupon preferred a request that the expert employed by the Finance Committee be directed to make computations as to certain corporations, the names of which I furnished him, such computations to show the difference in the war-profits tax which would be paid by each corporation under the provisions of the bill as reported by the committee and likewise the amount that each corporation would pay as a war-profits tax under the amendment submitted by the Senator late in the session yesterday. I am informed by the expert that it will be impossible for him to furnish such computations before the close of the present day, if it is possible for him to furnish them even by that time.

Now, Mr. President, after the majority of the Committee on Finance has presented to the Senate, and advocated in debate for upwards of a month, one plan of collecting war-profits taxes from corporations, individuals, and partnerships, and then late in the session of yesterday presents a radically different plan, a plan which is denounced in the report submitted to the Senate by the majority, radically criticized as unsound in the speech opening the discussion on the bill made by the chairman of the committee, it does seem to me that it is unfair to the minority of the committee and unjust to the Senate that either cloture should be threatened or that a request be made for unanimous consent to close debate upon the bill and pass it through the Senate within the next three legislative days.

We have come now, Mr. President, to perhaps the most important provision of the whole bill, and when the other portions of the measure have been debated since the 11th day of this month, when the Senator from North Carolina opened the debate, to ask the Senate to consent to cut down the debate with this important vital provision pending and undebated and amended so that it is an entirely new proposition, so that every computation that has been made upon that part of the bill must be made over again in order to give Senators an understanding of its application and what it will mean, I think it is preposterous that the Senate should be confronted with a request to close this debate or that a cloture upon debate should be suggested at this time.

Therefore, of course, Mr. President, I shall object to unanimous consent to close this debate next Monday. If it is to be closed at that time or within a few hours of that time, let it be done by the application of the gag of cloture, which has lately been written into the rules of the Senate upon a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Before I proceed, I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] desires to offer some amendments to the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I withdraw the other amendments that I have offered and offer in lieu thereof certain amendments, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, they will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to follow the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin, because I do not wish to take up the time of the Senator from Alabama who wishes to finish before the extraordinary ceremonies are going to begin. I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if there is any day next week that he would agree for a final vote upon the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When the income-tax provisions and the war-profits tax provisions of the bill are disposed of, under the same unlimited debate which we have had on the bill up to the present time, I would not interpose an objection to fixing a time to vote, but it is so difficult in anticipation of how the debate will develop, and in view of the necessity, if the Senate is to act intelligently upon these great important provisions, in advance of that debate to fix a time that I hope the Senator will not request it.

I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to interpose no objection to closing debate after whatever time may be necessary to dispose of the sugar and any of the questions left over, and that should not take very much time, just as soon as we can get these important provisions thoroughly debated and thoroughly understood and disposed of by the Senate. That is all I ask.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the position of the Senator from Wisconsin is that he will not consent to fixing a day to vote upon the bill until after we have disposed of the excess-profits provisions of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That and the income-tax provisions.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the income-tax provisions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

RECEPTION OF THE JAPANESE MISSION.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, we all know that we have in the city as the guests of the Nation a number of distinguished statesmen representing the Government and people of Japan. I am sure it will be a pleasure to all the Members of the Senate to have an opportunity to be presented to the distinguished visitors, and for that purpose I move that the Senate now take a recess for 30 minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In anticipation of the adoption of that motion the Chair will appoint the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] to meet the distinguished guests and escort them into the Chamber. The Chair will request that at 1 o'clock, when the Senate reconvenes, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] will take the chair. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia that the Senate take a recess for 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

At 12 o'clock and 35 minutes the members of the Japanese mission, escorted by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore and headed by the Sergeant at Arms, appeared at the main door of the Chamber and were announced to the Senate by the Sergeant at Arms. The members of the mission were Viscount Ishii, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary; Vice Admiral Takeshita, Imperial Japanese Navy; Maj. Gen. Sugano, Imperial Japanese Army; Mr. Masanao Hanihara, consul general at San Francisco; Mr. Matsuzo Nagai, secretary of the foreign office; Commander Ando, Imperial Japanese Navy; Lieut. Col. Tanikawa, Imperial Japanese Army; Mr. Tadanao Imai, vice consul; and Mr. Owaku.

Mr. Aimari Sato, ambassador from Japan to the Government of the United States; Mr. Tokichi Tanaka, counselor of the embassy; Capt. Nomura, naval attaché; and Lieut. Col. Mizumachi, military attaché, accompanied the mission into the Senate Chamber, together with Mr. Breckinridge Long, Assistant Secretary of State; Brig. Gen. James A. Irons, United States Army; Capt. C. C. March, United States Navy; Mr. Ransford S. Miller, American consul general; and Mr. A. B. Ruddock, of the State Department, personally attached to Viscount Ishii.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. SAULSBURY) said: Senators, we are highly honored to-day by the presence of these distinguished guests, who come to us representing the most ancient and powerful Empire of the world. We have met here before and welcomed the distinguished missions from other great nations. Heroic Belgium, historic Italy, great Russia, beloved France, and democratic Britain have sent to us of their best, but to none have we extended a more cordial welcome than to-day we give to the representatives of great Nippon, that beautiful land of ancient tradition and passionate patriotism. [Applause.]

A mighty nation is the ancient Empire of Japan. Its youth renewed, it joins our great young Nation in pledging anew a continuance of our old friendship, which the trouble maker of the earth has tried so hard to interrupt. We now know how industriously insidious attempts have been made by the Prussian masters of the German people to bring about distrust and hatred in the world. We know what evil attempts they have made to breed hatred and distrust of us among our friends, and we welcome this opportunity to heartily congratulate our old friends who honor us to-day that by the capture of Tsing Tau and the German islands in the Pacific Japan has completely removed from the Far Eastern world the only threat, as we believe, to peace and prosperity, the only threat to lasting peace in eastern Asia. [Applause.]

Within the memory of living man Prussians have provoked four wars for conquest and in three succeeded. Their fourth attempt has roused the world to unified, concerted action.

The yellow peril was made in Germany, and Shangtung was seized; the Slav peril was made in Germany, and Serbia was overwhelmed and Russia was invaded; but the thick-witted, smug, self-centered supermen of Germany entering their last attempt at conquest have roused a real peril—a real peril to themselves—and the free nations that believe in international honor, in the binding force of treaties, and in the pledged word are grimly though so sorrowfully engaged in creating, perfecting, and bringing to successful issue an alliance for the benefit of all earth's people, which will protect the rights of nations, small and great, and enable them to lead their lives in peace, and lead them unafraid. This alliance we and the other free nations of the earth are creating to control the disturbers of the peace of the world, and it is now succeeding. The alliance we create is based on the brotherhood of man, the equal rights of men and nations. It is based on the universal kindly instincts of the human heart, no matter whether that heart beats in an eastern or a western breast, no matter where free men live, in America or Asia, in South Africa, in Europe, or in South America. The alliance we create is directed against and threatens only wrong, inhumanity, and injustice. It threatens only rapacity, greed, hypocrisy, and nationalized brutality. It threatens only military autocracy and the violators of treaties who disregard the pledged honor of nations. Our alliance is indeed a peril, but only to the new pirates of the seas, to the assassins of the air; to those who violate international decency and fair dealing, who misuse the forces of developed science and distort the teachings of philosophy, who would destroy civilization itself in the effort to accomplish world domination.

This peril our alliance has created is the peril to the central European powers but it bears no color label. It is and will be in the future the common glory of all true men of all free nations everywhere to have joined in its creation and success. It is an Anglo-French-Slav-Italian-Japanese-American peril to the misdeedant of the world. [Applause.] Allies in East and West are joined together to bring back lasting peace to a disordered and war-sick world. Let us renew our time-honored friendship with clasped hands and good wishes for the peaceful, friendly development of both our Nations and assure poor, stricken Europe that this western Republic and eastern Empire, together in friendly accord, will work for the good of all humanity. [Applause.]

This Congress has pledged all the resources of our great country to our common cause, the curbing of international rapacity and hate and barbarism.

Senators, I have never believed there was more than a jingling rhyme in the phrase that East is East and West is West and never the two shall meet, and we are happy to-day, while honoring our distinguished guests, to demonstrate to the world that there is no East and there is no West when strong men come together as friends, though they come from the ends of the earth, determined in friendly alliance to work out right and justice for themselves and all earth's peoples. [Applause.]

Let us never permit hereafter that evil tongues or wicked propaganda shall cause even the simplest minded among our people to forget the ancient friendship of our Nations or weaken the ties of mutual respect and regard in which we hold each other. This meeting to-day symbolizes complete international fraternity which common consciousness of international honor has brought about. Let it be eternal!

I have the honor of presenting to the Senators of the United States the most distinguished of our visitors, his excellency Viscount Ishii, chief of the mission from Imperial Japan. [Great applause.]

ADDRESS BY VISCOUNT ISHII.

Viscount ISHII said:

Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate of the United States, no words at my command can give adequate expression to the profound appreciation I have of this honor you confer upon us. We know full well the exalted dignity and the proud traditions of this illustrious branch of the great Legislature of the United States; and in the name of my country, my mission, and myself, I thank you most sincerely. To accept your courteous invitation and to occupy even the smallest fraction of the time allowed for the momentous deliberations of this august body is a great responsibility—a responsibility I do not underestimate, but from which I may not shrink.

I shall not, however, abuse this rare privilege by attempting to address at length, in a language of which I have but little command, trained leaders of thought and masters of argument and oratory. But I grasp this occasion to say to you that the whole people of Japan heartily welcome and profoundly appreciate the entrance of this mighty Nation of yours into the struggle against the insane despoiler of our civilization. [Applause.] We all know that you did not undertake this solemn task on the impulse of the moment, but that you threw your mighty weight into the struggle only after exercising a most admirable patience, with a firm determination that this world shall be made free from the threat of aggression from the black shadow of a military despotism wielded by a nation taught with the mother's milk that human right must yield to brutal might. [Applause.] To us, the fact that you are now on the side of the allies in this titanic struggle constitutes already a great moral victory for our common cause, which we believe to be the cause of right and justice, for the strong as for the weak, for the great as for the small.

We of Japan believe we understand something of the American ideal of life, and we pay our most profound respects to it. Jefferson, your great democratic President, conceived the ideal of an American Commonwealth to be not a rule imposed on the people by force of arms, but as a free expression of the individual sentiments of that people. Jefferson saw Americans not as a set of people huddled together under the muzzles of machine guns, but he saw them as a myriad of independent and free men, as individuals only relying on a combined military force for protection against aggression from abroad or treachery from within. He saw a community of people guided by a community of good thought and pure patriotism, using their own special talents in their own special way under their own sacred roof-trees; not a machine-made Nation, but a living, growing organism, animated by one passion—the passion of liberty. [Applause.]

I assure you, gentlemen, that the Japanese ideal of national life is, in its final analysis, not so very far removed from yours. We conceive of our nation as a vast family, held together not by the arbitrary force of armed men, but by the force of a natural development. We shall call the common force that animates us a passion of loyalty to our Emperor and to our homes, as we shall call that of Americans a passion for liberty and of loyalty to their flag. [Applause.]

Blind loyalty without rational consciousness of the responsibility of self is but another name for slavery, while a right of liberty ill conceived, ignoring the mutual human affection and respect for the rights of every man, which form the essence of true loyalty, must be tantamount to anarchy. These two passions—passion of loyalty and passion for liberty—are they not really one? Is not the same control working in both cases—the intense desire to be true to our innermost selves and to the highest and best that has been revealed to us? You must be free to be Americans and we must be free to be Japanese. But our common enemy is not content with this freedom for the nation or for the individual; he must force all the world to be German, too! You had hoped against hope that this was not so; but that noble hope fled and your admirable patience was exhausted. You did not then hesitate to face the issue and the foe, as you are facing it, with that great American spirit which has loved and still loves liberty, which loves the right more than peace and honor more than life. [Applause.]

We of Japan took up arms against Germany because a solemn treaty was not to us "a scrap of paper." [Great applause.] We did not enter into this war because we had any selfish interest to promote or any ill-conceived ambition to gratify. We are in the war; we insist on being in it, and we shall stay in it, because earnestly, as a nation and as individuals, we believe in the righteousness of the cause for which we stand; because we believe that only by a complete victory for that cause can there be made a righteous, honorable, and permanent peace, so that this world may be made safe for all men to live in and so that all nations may work out their destinies untrammelled by fear. [Applause.]

Mr. President and gentlemen, whatever the critic half informed or the hired slanderer may say against us, in forming your judgment of Japan we ask you only to use those splendid abilities that guide this great Nation. The criminal plotter against our good neighborhood takes advantage of the fact that at this time of the world's crisis many things must of necessity remain untold and unrecorded in the daily newspapers; but we are satisfied that we are doing our best. In this tremendous work, as we move together, shoulder to shoulder, to a certain victory, America and Japan must have many things in which the one can help the other. We have much in common and much to do in concert. That is the reason I have been sent and that is the reason you have received me here to-day.

I have an earnest and abiding faith that this association of ours, this proving of ourselves in the highest, most sacred, and most trying of human activities—the armed vindication of right and justice—must bring us to a still closer concord and a deeper confidence one in the other, sealing for all time the bonds of cordial friendship between our two nations.

Again I thank you. [Great applause.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special ambassador from Japan and the Japanese ambassador to Washington will be glad to receive the Senators and their guests upon the floor as they desire to be presented.

The members of the Japanese mission took their places at the left of the Vice President's desk, and the Members of the Senate were presented to them by the committee appointed by the President pro tempore.

The distinguished visitors were escorted from the Chamber, and (at 1 o'clock p. m.) the Senate reassembled upon the expiration of the recess.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the address delivered in the Senate Chamber to-day by the President pro tempore of the Senate [Mr. SAULSBURY] and by Viscount Ishii, special ambassador from Japan, be printed in the RECORD of to-day's proceedings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], on account of illness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] because of illness, and to say that he is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I beg that this announcement shall remain for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, we are confronted by conditions in the country to-day the seriousness of which our Government and our people have never faced before. In order to bring the war to a successful termination it is necessary to send millions of men to the battle field, and it is equally necessary to levy and raise billions of dollars by taxation for the purpose of carrying on the war. It is hard to realize that a great war is even more dependent upon our industrial preparedness and our industrial resources than it is upon the men on the battle line. The cost of the Civil War was about $3,000,000,000. The first appropriation bill passed by this Congress to carry on the war amounted to $3,400,000,000, and we are now advised that we have appropriations in sight that will amount to more than $20,000,000,000 in the near future. A part of that money must be raised by issuing bonds, but it is absolutely necessary to raise a large portion by taxation. As to the amount of taxation, I believe that it is the duty of every patriotic citizen of this Republic to respond to the draft on his purse with that same loyalty that our boys have responded when they have been called to the colors. Therefore, personally, I have no patience with the money slacker. The man who finds his country in the throes of this great undertaking who hesitates to respond with his dollars, the man who wants special privileges and special exemptions from Congress at this time, in order that the burden of carrying on this war and sustaining his Government shall fall on others, is entitled to no place in this Republic except one that should bring on his head the condemnation and the contempt of the American people. But in levying the taxes that are necessary to sustain the war we must levy them in a way that will be equitable and just to all classes of our citizens; we must levy them in a way that will obtain a ready response from the business interests of the country and from the money of the country, in order that we may readily obtain the money we desire with which to carry on the war.

The chairman of the Finance Committee on yesterday stated that the bill which is now before the Senate would raise approximately two and a half billion dollars. I assume that the Finance Committee has conferred with the executive branch of the Government and has reached a determination as to the amount of money that we must raise in this bill to meet present conditions. Therefore, I stand ready to hold up the hands of the chairman of the Finance Committee and of his committee in raising two and a half billion dollars at this time and so much more as the executive branch of the Government may deem necessary in the future; but I want that tax levied where it will fall so as to equitably and justly distribute the burden of the war.

Under our system of Government there are two primary methods by which we can levy taxation for the support of the Government: One is by a tax on consumption, which falls on numbers, not on wealth; the other is a tax on wealth, that falls on dollars, not primarily on men. We have but recently in the history of our country invaded the field, so far as the National Government is concerned, of levying taxes on dollars; but in our war periods in the past we have not hesitated to tax wealth, and to-day a tax on wealth has become a part of the fiscal system of this Government.

I do not mean to say that in the great exigency which confronts the country we can abandon the system of a tax on consumption; that we can set aside all taxes that fall on numbers and not on dollars, for I fully realize that the great financial strain this country must face in the near future may require us to use every power the Government has to raise the money to carry on the war; but I do believe that under present conditions it is both equitable and just that a large proportion of this war burden should fall on the wealth of the Nation.

There are many reasons why this should be done. In the first place, the great wealth of this country is prepared to-day to meet a reasonable strain on its finances, and to respond without injury to business. On the other hand, pyramiding war prices, increasing the cost of a man's daily bread every hour, and the fact that many of the food providers of families have been called to the flag and are going to a foreign country to fight our battles, make it more difficult every day and every hour for the plain citizen of the United States who must toil for his living to raise the money with which to support his family at home. So every dollar of taxation that is levied upon consumption must fall, as an additional burden, upon the family that is already in distress. I do not say this in opposition to the direct taxes that are contained in this bill, for I am not opposing them; but I think we should bear those questions in mind in proceeding with our scheme of taxation.

When it comes to the tax on wealth, in the main, the Finance Committee proposes to raise the additional revenue needed by two methods: One a tax on incomes, following the course of the law that now is on the statute books but increasing the rates to some extent; the other a tax on so-called war profits, profits that are supposed to have arisen and been accumulated by reason of war conditions.

I have no opposition to the committee's proposals in the main as to its levy on incomes. There are some exemptions the committee has written in the income portion of its bill that seek to exempt from the payment of taxes some great institutions in this country that are already paying taxes, and when the tiff comes I do not expect to vote for those exemptions; but so far as my discussion to-day is concerned, I shall not combat in any way the proposal of the committee in reference to the income taxes; I shall not discuss them or refer to them; but my references in discussing the question of taxation will be entirely to the provisions in the bill relative to the so-called excess profits tax or war profits tax.

Mr. President, the so-called war profits tax is comparatively of recent origin. Until the last few years, so far as I know, it was not carried in the scheme of taxation of any country in the world. It originated in a neutral country. When war conditions surrounding the kingdom of Norway were pressing their finances hard they evolved a scheme of taxation that rested solely on their shipping interests. Finding that much of their industrial business was flat on its back, while their shipping interests were making enormous profits by reason of war conditions in neighboring countries, they levied a war tax on the profits of that business. Shortly afterwards that tax was adopted by many of the neighboring nations that were at war, until to-day every nation that is involved in this war, so far as I am informed, has on its statute books a tax levied on war profits.

The finance committee, in reporting this bill to the Senate, have stated that they are sustained in this proposal by the enlightened views of the statesmen of the great nations involved in this war. Well, they are sustained in their proposal so far as the theory of levying a war profits tax is concerned, and I do not combat that theory. I am not here to cry out against levying a tax on war profits; I am in favor of it.

We might levy this taxation and get the two and a half billion dollars that the Finance Committee desire in this bill in a much simpler way, but not in a juster way. Senators know now how much money was raised last year from the income tax. They know that tax can be pyramided. In a paragraph of twelve lines I could pyramid that tax so that it would bring the two and a half billion dollars desired without any change of the system of taxation whatever, merely by multiplying the rates by a fixed decimal number and bringing the ultimate equation to the amount of revenue desired. That would be simple; it would be easy; it would be a tax on wealth, but I do not believe that to accomplish the result in that way would be as equitable and as just to the American people as it is to levy a large portion of this tax on the war profits of the Nation.

My objection to the committee's bill is not directed to its purpose but to its method.

The committee attempt to sustain their bill by saying that it is based on the system adopted by the European countries. It is not. It is true that most of the European countries have adopted a system of war profit taxes by which they take a prewar period and say that men subject to the tax should only be taxed on profits in excess of those they earned in that prewar period; but every nation in Europe in working out the problem under that prewar period provision has said that the men engaged in business should not receive less than a certain per cent on their capital, whether it was obtained in the prewar period or not. Some nations have allowed seven per cent; some have allowed as high as nine per cent, and I believe on certain classes of business the British Government to-day has exempted profits up to 11 per cent, before beginning to levy their war-profits tax. But the bill as originally reported by the committee to the Senate left out entirely a percentage basis for the exemption, with the result that if one business was making no profits in the three years fixed by the committee as the prewar period on which to base the exemption, then that business would be taxed under the higher rates, it would have no exemption; but if another business was making 100 per cent during the prewar period it would have 100 per cent exemption before any taxation fell on it.

That was manifestly unjust, and the committee, recognizing the injustice of that proposition, have tried to eliminate it by providing that the business that was making no profit should have as an exemption the average profits of concerns engaged in like business—a very doubtful, a very hazy proposition the meaning of which no man with certainty can ascertain and as to which no man can successfully determine the equation.

My experience teaches me that when you are levying taxes, to be just to the people and fair to the Government you must have no twilight zone written within the walls of your tax bill. There must be a definite and well-defined line that can not be overlooked and can not be evaded; for if you do not do so you leave the door open to favoritism and often injustice in the administration of the law. If the provisions of this bill as presented by the committee are not filled with twilight zones and dark places that are not ascertainable and not understandable, then I have never seen a bill reported to the Congress of the United States that was in that category.

I defy any Senator here to take the provisions of the Senate bill as reported here and definitely determine what it means. It would take a Philadelphia lawyer to abstract from this bill its intricacies. Why should they be here? This is a proposition of exemption. They call it taxation. It is taxation in a way, but its primary purpose is to exempt certain wealth from taxation; for, as I said a moment ago, it would be a simple matter to reach all wealth along the lines of the income tax by merely multiplying the present rates by a decimal number.

I am not objecting to the proposal that certain wealth should be exempted, that the burden of this taxation should fall on war profits, but I do say that when you make that exemption you should make it so clear that all men may read it as they run. There must be no favoritism in the proposal.

The committee, in response to what I believe is the sentiment of the Senate, have attempted to amend their bill. As I said, they reported here a bill without any limitation as to amount, under which, if a great corporation in this country earned 100 per cent in the prewar period, it would have been exempted 100 per cent; and if some corporation was meeting with misfortunes in the prewar selected period, then the amount of its exemption would be very difficult of ascertainment. But on yesterday evening, after this bill had been before the Senate for weeks, the chairman of the Finance Committee yielded to what public opinion has a right to demand of the committee—that is, that this exemption shall be equitable, reasonable, and just—and they now propose that under the exemption no man shall be taxed until he has been exempted and no man shall receive more than 10 per cent as his exemption, and that the prewar basis shall start thereafter.

Why play favorites again? They yield to what I conceive to be the sentiment of the Senate to an extent; but if they yield, why not yield to the main point directly? Of course, the bill is very much better than it was when it was presented to the Senate; very much fairer and very much juster with the amendments now offered by the Finance Committee.

My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD], in presenting his amendment to the Senate some days ago in an able address, pointed out to the Senate some of the inequalities that then existed in the bill. Some of the Members who are on the floor now may not have been here then; and I want to call to your attention a few sentences that were contained in his speech, showing the inequality of the bill as it was originally reported.

He stated this:

Compare Scoville Manufacturing Co. with American Sugar Refining Co. Scoville earned $13,403,462 and will pay $6,202,254 taxes, or 47 per cent of its profits. The sugar refinery earned $13,703,444 and will pay $690,410 taxes, or 5 per cent of its profits.

Why? Because one company was making greater earnings in the prewar period, and had an exemption to that amount; the other was not.

Again, he called your attention to this fact:

The Central Leather Co. had $15,489,201 profit and will pay $4,520,102 taxes, while the Delaware & Lackawanna Railroad earned $16,200,148 and will pay only $1,122,837 in taxes.

One-fourth as much as the other company.

The American Can Co. earned $9,462,982 and will pay $766,381 in taxes, or 8 per cent. The United States Industrial Alcohol Co. earned $4,884,586. It will pay $1,644,757 in taxes, or 33 per cent.

One corporation paying taxes equal to 8 per cent on the profits and the other paying taxes equal to 33 per cent on the profits.

Let me read one more paragraph to show this inequality:

As a final illustration, from the Morgan list, of the wonderful equality of the committee's plan I point out that the Scoville Manufacturing Co., with a capital of $21,000,000, will be called on to pay $6,202,254 in taxes, that being 47 per cent of its net income, 30 per cent on its capital, and 48 per cent of its excess profits, while the great and wealthy Pennsylvania Railroad, with a capital of $930,400,000, is called on to pay 3 per cent of its net income, eighteen one-hundredths per cent on its capital, and 14½ per cent of its excess profits.

That is the bill which came before the Senate. Those are the inequalities of this exemption—one great corporation practically exempt from taxation and another corporation penalized to the extent of half its earnings. Does the Senate of the United States think a bill can be sustained before the American people with an injustice of that kind written upon its face?

But the committee proposes to amend the bill. They propose to concede the argument and meet the conditions suggested. The question is whether they have done so.

In the first place, this Senate bill is different from the war-tax bills of every nation of the earth except a small clause in the Italian taxing system that relates to commercial travelers. But with that one exception it varies from every tax bill that is written by the enlightened nations of the earth, and it varies in this way:

Those nations, where they allow 6 or 7 or 8 or 10 per cent earnings before they commence to apply their war taxation, apply it flatly on the capital. You know what you are doing. For some reason that is unknown to me the Finance Committee of the United States Senate have evolved a plan that is unknown in the finance of the world. They propose to pyramid this exemption on percentages; not to make the exemption on percentages, not to levy the tax on percentages, but to pyramid the exemption on percentages. They do not say that you shall have 8 per cent taxes exempt to you, and then above that you shall begin to pay 5 per cent on so much of your earnings and 10 per cent on so much more, and so on up—no; not at all. They propose that the exemption shall rest on the earnings of the prewar period, with certain limitations that they have now put in the bill, and some limitations they already had there, but the main basis was on the prewar period. Now, above that do they commence their taxation in a uniform way? No; not at all. They then make their tax relate to the percentage of the exemption to the present earnings. It seems to me it is manifest that the tax under this bill is levied on a basis to take away from the man that hath not even that which he hath.

Now, listen to this:

That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax) equal to the following percentages of the excess profits (determined as hereinafter provided):

And then it says:

Twelve per centum of the amount of such excess profits not in excess of fifteen per centum of the deduction allowed by section two hundred and three, section two hundred and four, or section two hundred and five, as the case may be;

The deduction allowed by section 203, section 204, or section 205 being the difference between the net income and the war profits as determined.

Then the next bracket says:

Sixteen per centum of the amount by which such excess profits exceed fifteen per centum of such deductions and do not exceed twenty-five per centum thereof;

Now, I ask any Senator here who has not given hours of study to this exemption proposition, can he sit in his seat and say what that means? Why should we write on the statute books an exemption intended to exempt from taxation the wealth of this country in language that the American people can not understand?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator whether this attempt of the committee to tax war profits in proportion to their size is not analogous to the tax which we levy on incomes, which is graduated up in very much the same way, so that the larger the rate of income, the larger the rate of tax? Is it not in exact analogy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think so, but that may have been what the committee had in mind; but if it was what the committee had in mind, it was a very unjust proposal to the American people.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not referring to the original proposition of the committee, because I agree with the Senator that the exemption was defective. I am speaking now of the proposal as the committee has amended it, which I think cures substantially the criticism which has been made.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, not at all. The committee's proposal limits the amount of exemption to 10 per cent before they start to tax, but the balance of the provisions of this bill are still there. This proposal to fix the rate of exemption on the percentage of the prewar period as compared to present war profits is still in the bill. It is limited; I grant the Senator that it is not nearly so vicious as it was when the bill was reported, but it is within the body of the bill still.

I will say this to the Senator: He suggests the committee probably had in mind levying the tax on the basis we levy the income tax, that the man of small income should be taxed at a low rate, and that great returns should be taxed at a high rate. Why, I myself reported that bill originally to the House of Representatives. I stood for that basis. That is just as to the individual; but when you come to apply it to the corporation, it brings about absolute injustice.

The Senator should bear in mind that many of these great corporations are not owned by the men of great wealth who handle them, but there are thousands and hundreds of thousands of small stockholders to whom these dividends shall be distributed. Now, if you attempt to levy your system of taxation exactly and identically on the basis you levy your income tax, letting the corporations stand as a unit as the individual stands as a unit, what do you do to the stockholders? Suppose I have a corporation of $100,000 and I make 10 per cent—$10,000—and you have a corporation of a million dollars and make 10 per cent—$100,000—when you come to distribute those assets to the holder of one share of stock in your corporation you distribute the like amount that I would distribute in mine, because each has made 10 per cent. But you have collected $100,000, and I have collected $10,000. Suppose we say that we will follow the income tax system and on the corporation we will tax the first $10,000 2 per cent and pyramid the last $10,000 10 per cent, what is the result? I have not worked it out in figures, but you would have probably five times as much taxation on the money that was going to your stockholders that I would have on mine.

Do you mean to say for a minute that it is just that because a man has invested his money in a corporation of a million dollars and only has a thousand dollars worth of stock he should be taxed five times as much as a man who invested his money in a corporation and only has one share of stock that has a capitalization of $10,000? It will not work out. It is not just.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. In the case just cited by the Senator he does not mean to say that under the provision the committee has reported it would be five times as much in one case as in the other.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. If the Senator had listened to me—

Mr. SMOOT. I listened very attentively.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the Senator did not catch what I said. I said to the Senator from Nebraska I had not made the calculation; that I only made a rough estimate in my mind as I went along for illustration, not referring to the committee's bill, but referring to the illustration.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that in the case he just cited, under the provisions of the committee bill, if the stockholder in the corporation of $100,000 made 10 per cent, and the stockholder in the corporation of a million dollars made 10 per cent, the rate of taxation would be exactly the same.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sorry the Senator from Utah has not studied his own bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I have studied it. I know every word of it and every result that it will bring.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is so easy of demonstration to the Senator that he is not correct that I shall demonstrate it to him in a moment. I do not mean to say that there will be the wide difference I was speaking of in my illustration to the Senator from Nebraska, but I will illustrate to the Senator right now the difference in that proposition, how the inequity in your bill reaches that very point.

By the grace of public sentiment you have limited this exemption to 10 per cent, and you have given everybody an opportunity to be exempt 6 per cent. So I have taken your two extremes. As to your earning capacity, take a corporation of $1,000,000—I am talking now about the inequalities in the bill as you rest the exemption, not about the exact earning capacity. A corporation with $1,000,000 that earned 10 per cent in the prewar period, or $100,000, and $500,000 in the war period would find itself in this condition: It would have $100,000 exempt under the Senate committee bill, to start out with, from taxation. Then the second item under the Senate committee bill would pay a tax on the difference between 10 per cent and 15 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator says $100,000 would be exempt. He means exempt from extraordinary taxes, not exempt from all taxation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated in the beginning so that I would not have to repeat it continually that I was not referring to income taxation at all. My remarks refer entirely to taxation under this clause of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. War profits.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The war profits clause, of course. I am not referring to the income tax.

On the first bracket the taxation would be the difference between 10 and 15 per cent, not of its earnings but of the deduction, its exemption taken from its earnings. You would deduct $100,000 from the $500,000. Take 15 per cent of what is left, and that would give you $60,000.

The second bracket would be between 15 and 25 per cent or $40,000, and the fourth bracket, the fifth bracket, and the sixth bracket would be $100,000 each.

Now, how do they work out? On the first $100,000 you pay no tax. That is exempt under the prewar-period plan. On the second bracket, on $60,000, you pay 12 per cent, or $7,200.

On the third bracket, $40,000, you pay 16 per cent, or $6,400.

On the fourth bracket of $100,000 you would pay 20 per cent, or $20,000.

On the fifth bracket you would pay 25 per cent, or $25,000, and on the sixth bracket, that is between 75 and 100 per cent on the $100,000, you would pay 30 per cent, or $30,000.

That is as far as I have pursued the Senate committee amendment. In other words, your tax on that $500,000, if you were earning 10 per cent before the war, would be $88,600 or an average of 17.72 per cent on your profits.

Now, let us see how it will work out for the corporation that was only earning 6 per cent or did not earn anything and is given 6 per cent under this bill. For a corporation of a million dollars with 6 per cent exemption for the prewar period and earning $500,000 in the war period, its exemption would be $60,000. Its first tax valuation from 6 to 15 per cent would be $66,000. Its second would be $44,000. Its fourth bracket would be $110,000. Its fifth bracket would be $110,000, and its sixth bracket would be $110,000.

Now, on the $66,000 the first item after the exemption would pay a tax of 12 per cent or $7,960. Its second item, $44,000, would pay a tax of 16 per cent or $6,940. Its fourth item of $110,000 would pay a tax of 20 per cent or $22,000. Its fifth item of $110,000, 25 per cent, $27,500. Its sixth item, of $110,000, 30 per cent, $33,000, making a tax that would amount to $97,400 or 19.48 per cent of its total profit.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not the fact that one corporation has been benefited by the war more than the other?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. One of them has risen from a profit of 10 per cent to 50 per cent and the other has risen from 6 per cent to a much larger per cent. Certainly they are not both benefited in the same degree.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say to my friend from Nebraska he has probably absorbed the sentiment of the committee that to him that hath shall be given and to him that hath not shall be taken away even that which he hath, but it is a new basis of levying taxation that I never heard of in income taxes before.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As I understand the Senator, both these corporations pay equal taxation normally. Now, a war comes and you are proposing to levy a tax upon the war profits. If one corporation makes a larger increase in profits than the other should you not tax it at a higher rate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see no reason in the world why you should. What I say is that you should tax the business of this country on what it is making to-day. That is the basis of taxation. But when you come to an exemption there is a reason for giving the exemption in a different way from the plan proposed for individuals under the income-tax law. We are not here as the Senate of the United States to play favoritism with the business of this country. We are here to deal out even and exact justice between the citizens of this country, and if it was not that there is a reason for a basis of exemption there should be no exemption at all. What is that reason? It is a manifest one. It does not go to the individual. He has no right. It is a governmental question, and the question is the life of the nation. There is no injury that could come to the American people that would be greater than a panic in this country to-day. There is no injury that could come to our people, not even an invading army on our shores, that would be more disastrous to us than to overthrow the present prosperity of the business interests of America. That is why we are proposing to exempt business interests from the great burdens of this taxation up to the amount of their prewar earnings. It is not because these men have any right, because one man who earns a dollar to-day stands on a different basis before the Government of the United States than another man who earns a dollar. There is no equity and justice in that; but we recognize the fact that we must not destroy business. Now, we propose to levy great sums of taxation out of business, but the purpose of this war tax is to say to business, "You may have your prewar earning capacity or a reasonable prewar earning capacity before we lay the hand of the Government on your profits."

We often go into wrong channels of legislation by fixing our premises at the wrong starting point. If we are going to start out with the assumption that there are in this country any special favorites that are entitled to be taken care of and see that they get their profits, and that they escape part of the war burden because they made great profits before the war or because they are favorites of the Government, then the just basis of your taxation must fall. But when we propose an exemption and say that the great business of this country shall survive, that it shall have an opportunity to breathe, that it shall have the chance to develop and go on and carry on its industries that are absolutely necessary for the present life of the Nation, then we put it on a plane on which we can stand; we are on firm ground in the principle. Therefore, I say there is no reason for favoritism when you come down to the amount of the earnings the man is making to-day.

Now, what is the distinction between the committee amendment and the proposal of my colleague? Every one of the warring countries, every one except our own, has fixed a basis of taxation by saying that a man shall be entitled to his prewar profits or so much per cent on his capital, and some of them have gone entirely to the percentage basis. Now, what you want to do to accomplish this result is to assure as an exemption to the business of this country what would have been a reasonable earning capacity before this war came on in the ordinary channels of business and then exempt that portion of their business from taxation. Then above that amount you must apply your drastic war taxes, not all on one item, not on the first amount, but ultimately.

Now, the amendment offered by my colleague proposes to allow to all business in the United States, big or little, 8 per cent on the value of its property. I know that proposal was criticized by the Finance Committee, in saying that we can not ascertain the value of property now; that it is too difficult. Of course it is always difficult to assess the value of property, but every one of the 48 States in the Union is doing it to-day, and every one of the counties and municipalities in the Union is doing it, and it is the only way you can levy just taxation. That is, to levy it on property's earning capacity—the value of property. But the committee has conceded that, after rejecting it because they said it was impossible of obtaining. I find in the amendment they offered yesterday they say that a domestic corporation or partnership or citizen or resident of the United States shall be exempt by deducting from the net income of the trade or business he receives during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period. Now, listen to the amendment:

But such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Now, after three weeks' debate, in saying that was an impracticable way to set aside this exemption, when they came in here yesterday they say that no man shall earn more than 6 nor less than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital of the taxable year. The committee itself bases it on exactly what the Members of the Senate have been contending for.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who fixes the actual cash value?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Government; nobody else can fix it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not this amendment in section 202 limit the Government, where it is provided—

That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means: First, actual cash—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from North Carolina is referring to the committee amendment, I suppose?

Mr. OVERMAN. No; I am referring to the Bankhead amendment—section 202, on page 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from North Carolina may proceed, and I will find the amendment in a moment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has the Senator from Alabama introduced a second amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. He has abandoned his first amendment entirely.

Mr. OVERMAN. I was reading the first amendment. I have not seen the second amendment; but there is a provision in the first amendment, and I want to know whether the provision is in the second amendment—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is what the second Bankhead amendment, which is now before the Senate, provides:

Sec. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means: First, actual cash, and second, the actual value, of all assets other than cash, used or employed in the business; but does not include money or other property borrowed by the corporation or partnership.

Mr. OVERMAN. I find the same language is contained in the first amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, it is not the same language; it is different language; but what difference does that make? I am not discussing some other amendment; I am discussing the amendment which is before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. What I want to get at is who is to determine what actual cash value is? The amendment of the Senator's colleague which the Senator has just read states the "actual cash value," and in addition to that "the actual value of all assets other than cash." Take one of the great monopolies—it is as to those I desire to hear the Senator—in determining the actual cash value the Government is limited in placing a value on it by the words "First, actual cash," and second, "the actual value of all assets other than cash." Take the Harvester Trust, about which I have talked with the Senator. I should like to hear him in reference to that matter, since he has thought about it. In order to become a great monopoly that trust has bought up all of its competitors. For example, the Harvester Trust was competing with the Deering Co., the Aultman Co., and other great companies; but in order to destroy them and to become a monopoly, it bought them out, until now we have only one company in this country which is furnishing supplies of that character to the farmers. In ascertaining their capital the Government has got not only to take the cash value, but it has got to take the part of all its assets in the way of other property paid in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that is so, would such a company pay any taxes at all?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is right in his theory, but why discuss it? Does the Senator think that the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is going to put value on wind such as he describes? Is he going to put value on water?

Mr. OVERMAN. What I am afraid of is we may limit the Secretary of the Treasury by providing that, besides cash, he shall ascertain the value of other assets paid into the corporation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, there may have been proposals here that have sought to provide an exemption on watered stock, but there is nothing of that kind in the amendment of my colleague, and, so far as that is concerned, I do not see that there is in the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment fixes the valuation of the exemption on the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year. Actual invested capital does not mean wind nor watered stock. The Bankhead amendment says:

For the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means, first, actual cash.

Is there any watered stock or wind in actual cash that belongs to the company?

Mr. OVERMAN. Not in that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The amendment proceeds:

And, second, the actual value of all assets other than cash.

Can there be any wind in "actual value?" If it is "actual value," how can it include watered stock? Does not that tell the Secretary of the Treasury that he must consider only "actual value?" We can not go out and assess it. We can not go and say, "You shall discard this item or take that item;" but when we say to the Secretary of the Treasury that in ascertaining the amount of this exemption it shall be allowed on "actual value" that means assets that are of a market value that can be sold.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am inclined to agree with many things which the Senator has said, but I want to understand this correctly. Why not let the Secretary of the Treasury himself assess it? Then, when you do that, without putting this limitation on him, he can ascertain what the actual value is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely the Senator from North Carolina is right and that is exactly what we are doing. It is exactly what we have been doing all the time. Who else does the Senator from North Carolina suppose is going to assess this property except the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. OVERMAN. But he is going to assess it under the limitations which are placed upon him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no limitation in this amendment. If there were a limitation the Senator from North Carolina would be right; but is there any limitation contained in the words "actual value"?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not sure whether there is or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Evidently the Senator from North Carolina must want to put a limitation in the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. No, I do not. I want him—the Secretary of the Treasury—to assess the value; I do not want him to be limited as to his assessment. Take the General Electric Co., which has bought up almost all other companies of similar character and owns them now. Are they to be considered as assets?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not going to indict the Secretary of the Treasury for such a foolish proposition. When this says "actual value of all assets," how could you indict the intelligence and the integrity of the Secretary of the Treasury by saying that he would take into consideration and allow value for something that was watered stock?

Mr. OVERMAN. Would the Senator from Alabama accept an amendment to allow the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the actual value?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, this says so, but I should have no objection.

Mr. OVERMAN. If there is any doubt about it, would the Senator be willing to accept such an amendment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly I would; that is all I want; but when the language reads "actual value of all assets," I can not see what the Senator from North Carolina is talking about. If it can be stated any more clearly than "the actual value of all assets," I do not know how it can be done.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not want the Secretary of the Treasury to be compelled to consider that kind of assets, because that is where the water comes in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course, if a corporation have assets of value, which they have bought from somebody else, the Senator certainly does not want to rob them of their property.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was discussing the difference between the Senate committee amendment and the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD]. The clock admonishes me that it is about the hour of half past 12. We have ceremonies fixed for that hour, and I do not care to go into that discussion and to be stopped halfway in a few minutes. If the Senator in charge of the proceedings will let me know at what time he expects to take a recess of the Senate—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not yet been notified of the arrival of the guests, but they are expected within a very few minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the junior Senator from Alabama yield to his colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I must insist that better order be maintained in the Senate. We can not hear anything that is being said. It is evident that the disorder is in the galleries. If the occupants of the galleries can not properly conduct themselves, the galleries ought to be cleared.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has requested occupants of the galleries to refrain from conversation, and that must be done.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. As the matter which is being discussed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is very important, and as the guests in the galleries have come to witness the exercises, I would suggest to the Senator who has this bill in charge that we take a recess until such time as the ceremonies begin.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I had contemplated making that motion, but I thought it wise to wait until the distinguished statesmen from Japan have reached the Capitol. We might take a recess now, but I do not know when they will arrive.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But we can not have such order as we should have.

Mr. MARTIN. I think we have very good order in the Senate. I have been able to hear everything which has been said. I have seen no reason to complain of the order in the Senate. It has been much better than it would ordinarily be or than might reasonably be expected.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The disorder is in the galleries.

Mr. MARTIN. The occupants of the galleries have been orderly; there has been order on the floor of the Senate; there is nothing which has happened to interfere with the proper consideration of the matter before the Senate. I simply suggest that we had better wait until the distinguished statesmen from Japan arrive at the Capitol before we take a recess.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that perhaps he had better consult the desires of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] who, on account of the confusion, may wish to suspend.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, the galleries were not bothering me at all. I am perfectly willing to go on. I thought that the hour had come when the Senate desired to take a recess.

Mr. President, the amendment proposed by my colleague, as I have already stated, allows every corporation in this country a flat exemption of 8 per cent before the war tax is imposed. After the exemption of 8 per cent, on the next 5 per cent of profits, his amendment levies a tax of 5 per cent; on the next 5 per cent—not 5 per cent pyramided, not a deduction, but an actual 5 per cent—he levies a tax of 5 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator please indicate what that 5 per cent is to be calculated upon?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is to be calculated upon the profits. The whole basis of my colleague's amendment is profits, except as to the exemptions.

Mr. SIMMONS. I may have misunderstood the amendment of the Senator from Alabama; I did not read it until this morning; but I understood that that would be based upon 5 per cent of the invested capital.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; my colleague's amendment seeks to allow an 8 per cent exemption, not on the invested capital but on the value of the assets, and then when that is taken out he levies a tax on the first 5 per cent above that—

Mr. SIMMONS. Above what?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The first 5 per cent of profits above that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The first 5 per cent in excess of the assets?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will make myself clearer, perhaps, by giving an illustration to the Senator. Suppose a corporation has $100,000 of capital and earns $20,000. Eight per cent on the value would be $8,000. That would leave $12,000 to be taxed.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Alabama if he will yield to me now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

[At this point the mission from Japan was received by the Senate.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was discussing the effect of my colleague's amendment and how it levied the tax on war profits. As I stated in the beginning, there is no contention on my part or of anyone else that I know of, for the purposes of this war tax, not to allow a reasonable exemption for business. The real question is how that exemption can be allowed in the most equitable and just manner.

Just before I took my seat, in stating the basis of the tax proposed in my colleague's amendment I stated that the levy of a subsequent tax related to the earnings of the corporation. That is true, but on reflection I may have misled the Senate in my statement of the case.

Under my colleague's amendment there will be a flat exemption to everybody of 8 per cent provided the corporation earns 8 per cent. After that all profits will be taxed, but not equally taxed, taxed in an ascending scale, and the ascending scale is based upon the proportion of capital as it relates to the profits. For instance, the first 5 per cent that is earned above the 8 per cent will be ascertained in this way. An estimate will be made of 5 per cent of the capital. That will be deducted from the earnings and it will be taxed 5 per cent.

Then you come to another bracket, and you will take again 5 per cent of the capital and deduct that from the earnings, and you will tax that 10 per cent. Then the next bracket you come to will increase from 15 to 20 per cent. That is 15 or 20 per cent based on the capital will be deducted from that much of the net earnings, and that proportion of the earnings will be taxed 25 per cent. Then the next bracket will be taken based on the capital deducted from the earnings and taxed 75 per cent.

The reasons why I think the amendment of my colleague is more equitable, is more just, than the Senate committee bill is this: The purpose of this exemption, and that is all that is involved in this controversy, is to allow the business of the country a fixed earning capacity before you attempt to levy war taxes on it. I think everybody will agree that a man in business is entitled without classing it as war profits to make 8 per cent on his actual invested capital. But that does not enter the domain of war profits, and you should not apply to it excessive taxation. Even above the 8 per cent you might go up another 10 per cent on the capital and carry your earning capacity on the capital up to 18 per cent and in many businesses not invade what would be actual war profits.

Therefore, in my colleague's amendment in the first two brackets, each of them advancing 5 per cent on the capital, the tax is comparatively low, the first one pays 5 per cent. On the next bracket of 5 per cent on the capital it is taxed 10 per cent. Above 18 per cent you can rest with a reasonable degree of certainty that you have invaded the domain of war profits, and there the percentage of increase ought to increase very rapidly.

Of necessity there is a twilight zone in determining what are prewar profits and what are war profits where there is an uncertainty. In that zone of uncertainty, that twilight zone of profits, I think it is fair and just to the country that the levy of additional taxes should be moderate, but when you pass outside of the twilight zone of uncertainty and invade the condition of absolute war profits why should you restrain your hand? Why should not the Government of the United States levy on absolute war profits high rates of taxation obtainable at this time for the purpose of carrying on this war?

We can not put all men on an equality so far as their ability to make money is concerned. The opportunities of business, the energy of the individual equation, all make a difference and should be recognized. Why should anybody recognize the right of a corporation in the United States to amass profits out of war conditions?

Mr. KING. Or an individual.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Or an individual. I am speaking of corporations because, as a matter of fact, most of the conditions that we are addressing ourselves to in this amendment relate to corporate property. I say that before this war came on there were few corporations in the country that were making 18 per cent legitimately above the value of their property. You may say there were some mining plants that with a very small investment struck a gold mine, for instance, and that on account of its great production of gold the profits are enormous compared to the original investment. I ask you if the present value of to-day of that property has not increased in proportion to those earnings, and under this bill that is taken into consideration. But when your values and your profits relate entirely to war conditions then your value does not follow profits. It may to a slight extent, but it does not follow it, because the investor knows when war conditions are over those values will cease to exist and they are not the values of to-day. But when you get above 18 per cent, I say that you have undoubtedly invaded the domain of war profits.

Of course, you may say to me that there are some corporations that were making very large profits prior to our declaration of war. But they were making them based on the war conditions of Europe and not on normal profits, and they got their profits in that era before the Government of the United States needed their money and needed to levy these taxes, and because they had the opportunity for three years prior to our entering this war to make enormous profits out of our allies is no reason why that condition should be recognized in the legislation we are writing to-day.

Now, is there any better place where we can levy taxes, is there any better way for the American people to raise the money to run this Government than from profits that are created not by the brain and the brawn of the American people, not by successful investment, not by close attention to business, but by reason of the fact that a great world war has surrounded the business interests of this country and the particular lines of manufacture in which these men have been engaged have greatly enhanced in the value of their products by reason of the fact that men are fighting for their lives, that nations are fighting for existence, and the demand for the particular products of manufacture has so greatly increased that inordinate prices must be paid for them. That is not a stable business condition. That is not a basis on which our industries must rest in the future. That is not a basis on which the future growth of American industry will rest and go on. So I say that when we reach that point, that established point, where we are sure that we have invaded the domain of war profits we are entitled to levy very high taxation.

Now, that is the real distinction between the bill of the Senate committee and the amendment offered by my colleague. They go on in bracket after bracket fixing the rate of taxation until they get up to over 300 per cent before they apply a tax of 60 per cent. Will you tell me what right any American citizen has by reason of war conditions, when the life of his Nation is at stake and our soldiers are on the firing line, to say that he shall have 75 per cent of his war profits? There is no reason why he should withhold 75 per cent of profits when he is making 200 per cent profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I think from what the Senator has just said that the Senators present who have not studied the bill carefully since the amendments have been presented would think that the committee amendment provides a profit upon the capital stock and surplus of 200 per cent. Such is not the case. The tax is imposed upon the percentage of increase over and above the percentage of the prewar period and not upon the capital stock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend corrects me right in a way, but he fails to state that the percentage relates to an exemption and not to the tax, and that reverses it. It is the exemption that you allow and not the tax. Here are the figures in the bill as I find them. I hope the Senator will correct me if I am mistaken. I will read them out, because I want them to go into the Record, and I want to be right. You are going to exempt some people 6 per cent, some people 10 per cent on their capital, and allow them to earn that much. Then you are going to tax 15 per cent of the relation that the exemption bears to the earnings. You are going to tax them 12 per cent. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly why I want the Senator to understand what this tax is. The rate is 12 per cent on the amount of such excess profits, not in excess of 15 per cent of the deductions allowed by sections 203, 204, or 205, as the case may be.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. SMOOT. In other words, if a concern made $5,000 over and above the exemptions as provided in these sections and whatever section that particular business may fall under, then if they had been making $5,000 during the prewar period of course they would be taxed upon the percentages provided for in the bill of 100 per cent increase because of the fact they made $5,000 more than they made under the prewar period. It is not a hundred per cent on the capital; that has nothing whatever to do with it. I will state the exact amount.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that. I have stated it several times. It is on the percentage which the exemption bears to earnings.

Mr. SMOOT. It would be 30 per cent on the amount of the increase, because the amount of increase was 100 per cent. I understood the Senator to say it was only upon the percentage of the amount of the deduction; but it is upon the amount of the increase after the deductions are allowed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand the Senator's position, and if I have not stated it clearly it is my misfortune in stating it. I have several times stated to-day that I understood that the tax as proposed by the committee is based upon the percentage which the exemption bears to earning capacity. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. It is based upon whatever the percentage of increase is over and above the prewar period profits.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is, the percentage which the exemption which the committee call prewar profits—I call it the exemption—bears to the profits or earning capacity. I think I have stated that several times.

The basis of the Senate committee amendment is on the percentage of the relation of the prewar earnings or exemption to the profits of to-day, and instead of increasing the amount subject to this tax, as I figure the proposition, it decreases it. It brings down the volume that is going to be subjected to taxation so that it does not reach the heavy class of profits at all until a much later period than it would under the amendment presented by my colleague. I will not go into all the details; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the primary difference between the two proposals.

Here is the Senate committee proposal which is involved in endless complication as to how the tax is going to be imposed. There can be no doubt in the world, as you will find if you simply take a pen or pencil and make the estimate for yourself, that when you invade the domain of war profits for a long journey into that domain the taxing power of this Government is lightly laid on the early profits; those profits close to the exemption. The tax proposed by the Senate committee amendment is as much or possibly a little more than that proposed by the amendment offered by my colleague; but what I say is that we are attempting to allow business to move under normal conditions before we lay the heavy hand of taxation upon the war profits; and in that twilight zone of doubt as to where real profits end and actual war profits begin, I think it but just and fair that the hand of taxation should be laid in a reasonable way and no extreme taxes levied; but when you have passed that domain, and have invaded the field of war profits and nothing else—money that men are making because other men have gone to war—I say that there is no justification in the Senate committee amendment withholding the power of taxation.

If that is done, what is the result? If you withhold the power of taxation when you have invaded the field of war profits—money that comes from the battle field—when you withhold the power of taxation at that point, what does it mean? It does not mean that you are relieving the American people of taxation. We have no power left to us to say that we shall only spend so much money and no more. War exigencies have driven us to a war budget. We must raise the money the executive branch of this Government says is necessary to conduct the war; we have no alternative. If we are patriotic, liberty-loving American citizens we must go on and carry our burden and place it on the American people to produce the result. So when the chairman of this great committee comes in here with a war budget and says that we must produce two and a half billion dollars by taxation upon the American people and then withholds his hand in levying on war profits, what does he do? What of necessity must he do? He has limited the amount of money that he is going to raise from that source and he must raise it from other sources of taxation.

When he comes to the other sources of taxation, he must either levy it under the income tax and go to small incomes to accomplish the result, or he must levy it by a consumption tax on the people who are furnishing the soldiers to carry on this war, the people whose cost of living is pyramiding every day. That is all there is in the equation left for the determination of Congress. It is not left for us to say how high the taxes shall be or how much taxes shall be levied but it is for us to say from what sources they shall be gathered—when you leave it to me to say as to whether a large portion of this revenue shall be gathered from the profits of the men who are reeking in money gathered from war profits or shall be levied on the backs of the struggling mass of the American people, there is no doubt in my mind which way I shall go and which way, in my judgment, the Senate of the United States should march.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama what amount of taxes would be raised under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] out of war profits as compared with the amount which it is said will be raised under the bill as reported by the committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Under the original proposal of the Senate committee the estimated revenue would be $562,000,000; that is, before they reported their last amendments. My colleague's amendment proposes to raise as much money and levy the tax in a more equitable way under the rates which he prepared. I have gone over those rates with an expert, and I have absolute confidence in his ability to work them out; and although I know that the committee has had the assistance of an expert from the Treasury Department, whom I regard in his line as one of the ablest men in the Government service, a man with whom I have had the pleasure of working in the past, yet I know, because it is no new question to me, that when revenue plans are being worked out the question of the revenue to be raised is always an estimate; some people may call it a guess; but the best that can be said of it is that it is an estimate, and it may vary to a great extent. I can say for the man who prepared these figures that under my direction he has prepared many estimates in connection with tariff schedules, and he has been a very close guesser of results.

Under the plan proposed by my colleague and according to the figures given to the Senate the total revenue that will be raised will amount to $815,000,000; but there is already an excess profits tax law which this bill repeals and under which $226,000,000 was collected, and deducting that from the $815,000,000 leaves $589,000,000 of revenue to be raised under this proposal, which is considerably in excess of the original proposal of the Senate committee.

The chairman of the committee has now revised his figures. He has very materially changed the bill by allowing every man to have 6 per cent exemption and allowing no man to have more than 10 per cent. On yesterday evening the chairman of the committee stated to the Senate that the changes made in that respect and in raising the rates in one bracket, the highest bracket, so that it would levy a tax of 60 per cent instead of 50 per cent, would increase the taxes under this bill $500,000,000. Of course that was not contemplated by my colleague or myself in the preparation of his amendment.

I have had no opportunity whatever to study the new proposal of assessments according to the amended bill of the Finance Committee submitted last night, and I am not in a position to say as it is presented to-day whether it can prove up to what the chairman of the Finance Committee claims for it; but I want to say to the Senator in reference to the estimates of revenue that the estimates made under my colleague's amendment, outside of the first two brackets, which approximate those of the Senate committee bill, are very much higher than under the committee bill, and, so far as the exemption is concerned—and the Senate committee exempts 6 per cent in some cases and 10 per cent in others, while my colleague's amendment grants a flat exemption of 8 per cent—I do not think that the 6 and 10 per cent will probably fall far away in the general average from the 8 per cent, which is the average of the two figures. Therefore the exemption offered by my colleague, being an average of the exemptions offered by the committee, the first two brackets approximating the others in the amount of the levy, and the higher brackets being undoubtedly very much higher, it seems to me it is sound to say that the amendment offered by my colleague must produce more revenue than the amendment proposed by the committee, especially when there is taken into consideration the fact that the increased taxes proposed by the Senator from North Carolina only apply to profits in excess of 300 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that he has not had an opportunity to make any investigation which would enable him to state how much would be raised by the proposed amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean since it has been amended.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; this new amendment. If the Senator from Alabama is not able to pass judgment upon that question, I can not imagine who in the Senate would be in a position to vote on it at all. Here is an amendment brought in at this time with practically no information at all accompanying it. I talked with an expert last night at some length, and if he be correct—and he has had a vast amount of experience—this new amendment will not raise by any manner of means what the committee has reported it will raise.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am only guessing at it, and, from the information which I have obtained in making estimates on the former amendment, I think the Senator is correct in his statement. I will not say that it will not raise a billion dollars, because I have no estimate, but I do not believe for one moment that it will accomplish that result.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. BANKHEAD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to have the opinion of the Senator from Alabama as to the estimate of revenue to be obtained from the original Finance Committee amendment, which I think was $562,000,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it will go quite that high, but I think it will approximate $562,000,000.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I know prophecy is hazardous, but, based upon such figures as I can make, I am willing to hazard the opinion that it will go very much above that, and I should think from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 above that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will tell the Senator how my estimates were obtained. The expert who has worked them out took 100 selected corporations covering all classes of business, with their capital stock, their prewar earnings, and their present earnings, and with that as a basis he worked out a set of tables applied to that situation, and then applied those percentages to the well-known earnings before the war and after the war to all of the corporations noted in the fiscal reports. That is about as close as you can get to it. Then he applied the tax to that. Of course that is merely an estimate or guess, but it was actually worked out, and I think it is reasonable to say that the estimate is correct.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. Were the hundred corporations, which the expert selected, large corporations or small ones?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They were average corporations. I have not the paper with me now, but they embraced all classes and all conditions, such as are always taken under such circumstances.

Mr. KELLOGG. Which amendment is the Senator from Alabama now advocating—the last amendment offered by his colleague?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am advocating the amendment that is now before the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is the last amendment offered by the senior Senator from Alabama?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is printed in to-day's RECORD.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it not a fact that the committee's last amendment, which limits the exemption some percentage between 6 and 10 per cent of prewar earnings is going to raise a large amount of money, and is that money not coming out of small business and not out of the big corporations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the chairman of the committee indicated in his remarks yesterday afternoon. If that is not the result, then the Finance Committee exempted from taxation a very large sum of war profits, for this reason: The chairman of the Finance Committee stated yesterday afternoon that this change would increase the revenues under this bill $500,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Am I correct in understanding that the Senator represented me as saying that the largest part of the increase would come from the small corporations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not say the Senator stated that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator said that I so stated on yesterday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. What I did say on yesterday, Mr. President, was that the larger part of this increase would come from subjecting to the tax a class of corporations that would not be subject to tax under the original bill as presented by the committee, because they were making very large profits before the war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is better not to have any question about that, and right here I should like to read into the RECORD what the Senator from North Carolina did say. Here is his statement:

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say again that it is expected, as a result of these changes in the bill, that the amount of revenue estimated to be derived from the bill will be increased in round numbers $500,000,000. Of course a considerable part of that, though much the smaller part of it, is the result of the increase in the rates, raising the maximum graduated rate from 50 up to 60 per cent; but the larger part of that increase comes from the fact that corporations and individuals who during the prewar period were making a super-normal profit, a large profit, will be entitled to this reduced exemption on account of fixing the maximum at 10 per cent. Together the amendments swell the additional receipts of the Government from this bill from $562,000,000 to $1,060,000,000. That is the additional amount that will be raised by this bill—$1,060,000,000—from excess war profits, which, added to the amount estimated to be raised under the existing law which we have repealed and incorporated in this, makes $1,286,000,000 which will be raised by this bill from the taxes upon war profits.

What I say is this: Of course the Senator made the statement that only $70,000,000 of that half a billion dollars is going to come out of that top bracket, and we can assume, for the sake of the argument, that that is correct. That leaves an increase of $430,000,000, as he says, by reason of his amendment. Manifestly the place where it is increased is right above 6 or 10 per cent, and manifestly it must come out of the smaller incomes; but what I say is that if the result of this amendment is as stated by the Senator from North Carolina, it is an absolute indictment of his original bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one minute. He brought in here in the beginning a bill that produced only $562,000,000, according to his statement, with exemptions allowed from war profits of $430,000,000. I say it indicts the whole scheme of legislation that has been brought before the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. If it is true that the committee amendment will raise a large amount of money from the small corporations and partnerships by reason of limiting the exemption to an amount between 6 and 10 per cent, why does not the amendment of the Senator from Alabama do the same thing, as his exemption is 8 per cent, and most of the big corporations are not earning more than 8 per cent, and therefore the big percentages come upon the small businesses, where the capital bears no relation whatever to the earnings, but where the enterprise of the partners—many partners—earns the money? I do not see why the same indictment will not lie against the amendment here as against the committee amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, the Senator would be manifestly correct if we were agreeing on a general scheme of taxation; but the Senator has clearly overlooked the fact that this clause of the bill applies to war profits. If you were going to levy general taxation on general business and general earnings, you would not engage in levying a tax of 10 or 20 or 25 or 50 or 75 per cent of the earnings—manifestly not. Now, we tax those earnings. The Senator is right about that for a general scheme of taxation, and the committee have met his point to some extent. They may have to go higher, and probably will, before this war is over; but they have met it by increasing the normal rates and other rates in the income tax. That meets exactly what the Senator contends for. But what the committee is trying to do, and what I believe is the sentiment of the Senate on all sides, is this: We may differ about the method, as I said, whether we take the committee's method or somebody else's method; but I do not believe there is any real difference in the Senate with regard to the proposition of taxing war profits separately from all other classes of profits, and taxing them at a high, a very high, rate.

The naming of this 8 per cent is not for the purpose of taxation at all. It is for the purpose of exemption. There are classes of business in this country, as the Senator points out, that are not making any war profits to-day that probably under this bill will not be taxed as war profits, because they are not making them. That does not exempt them from taxation. The real question involved here is a question as to where you are going to draw the line as to where prewar profits end, where normal profits end, and where profits that are created by the blood of this war begin.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, the question to which I should like to attract the Senator's attention is this: Take the case of a small corporation having $25,000 or $50,000 capital, and three or four partners, who never earned less than 25 or 50 per cent, and where 50 per cent is not more than a fair earning to those partners. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama, the same as the amendment of the committee, will penalize that concern and impose a big tax on a normal, reasonable earning, while it will not penalize the big corporation whose earnings represent a fair income on its capital.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course the Senator puts up a hard case, but I do not think it will work very hard. The basis of my colleague's amendment is on capital. Now, I recognize the fact that you may find a small corporation with small capital that by reason of the industry of the men engaged in the business is earning a large amount of money on that capital; but it is not the capital, it is the men that are really earning it. Now, for the convenience of that business those men may pay themselves very small salaries, inadequate salaries for the work they do, and therefore let the profits fall on the capital, to show how much profits they are making, when it is really the profit of their own industry and not their capital. That proposition is very easily adjusted by a mere adjustment of salaries.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information and not for controversy?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, the radical difference between the committee plan and the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is this: In the case of the Senator from Alabama, you measure the profits by the capital. You take that as the basis of determining the profits. Under the committee plan, on the other hand—either the original plan or this modified plan—the basis of measurement is what they call prewar profits. Is not that the fundamental difference?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It was the fundamental difference in the original bill, but not as it exists now. It was the fundamental difference as the bill existed before the amendment of last evening.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, there is only one modification of the original plan, and that is, making a basis of at least from 6 to 10 per cent profit. Otherwise, the basis is exactly the same.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; that is true, but that changes the entire basis. The Senator was correct before this bill was amended yesterday evening. My colleague's bill was based on the relation of profits to capital. The Senate bill was based on the relation of prewar earnings to war earnings. But on yesterday evening the Finance Committee wrote into this bill this language:

But such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Then they absolutely invaded the field that was occupied by my colleague's amendment, by going to capital as a basis for exemption, and leaving all the frills and foibles of the Senate bill still dragging along behind. That is the condition.

I have no purpose in this bill except one, and that is to secure the money to run this Government by what I consider the best method. I have no criticism to make of the committee in its efforts to tax war profits. I am in thorough accord with the belief that a large amount of the revenue that we raise should come from war profits. The only difference between my suggestion and that of the committee is as to the method which the committee has adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. KING. I have been ill for several days and absent from the Senate much of the time and did not hear the opening part of the speech of the Senator from Alabama. I am interested in knowing whether he has discussed the reason why he preferred the present method of determining the tax rather than a flat rate? It seems to me that any attempt to graduate the tax upon the basis of the capital of corporations will meet with many difficulties.

As the Senator knows, if he will pardon me, most of the corporations have been in existence for some time—that is, those that are making profits. The elements that have gone into what he denominated capital are multitudinous. Good will, trade-marks, and various other things have gone into what has been denominated capital. In Great Britain, where the corporations are so closely under the supervision of the Government, and where there has not been the watering of stock and the many other scandals in corporations such as have existed in this country, it is less difficult to find out what the capital is, what its value is, and what is real capital upon which profits ought to be allowed. It seems to me that it is going to be an almost unsolvable problem in this country to determine what is the capital of corporations and to attempt to adjust the taxes upon capital. It seems to me the better way is to make a flat rate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. A flat rate on what?

Mr. KING. On the profits, and ascertain what the profits are, measured by what the prewar profits were.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then the Senator involves himself in the intricacies of the bill that the Senate committee itself has abandoned. They could not stand the fire. The barrage fire was too much for them, and they ran from under and abandoned that principle themselves, and have had to come themselves to an exemption based on actual value.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not know what prompted the committee to abandon the position they formerly assumed; but it seems to me that we find in Great Britain an ample precedent and warrant for adhering to the view of determining the method of ascertaining what the profits are.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I discussed that question for nearly an hour this morning, and I am sure my friend from Utah will pardon me for not rehearsing it.

Mr. KING. I am sorry that I did not hear the illuminating address of the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator from Utah will read the speech that was delivered some days ago by my colleague in reference to the inequalities of the system that he opposes, where he finds that one corporation is taxed 3 per cent and another 45 per cent engaged in the same business, with the same earnings, growing out of the fact that the tax was based on a comparison of the prewar profits with the war earnings, I think that from the standpoint of equity and justice and an equal distribution of the burdens of taxation he can readily understand why the committee abandoned that proposal. But that is not in issue here now. There is no issue of that kind between the committee's amendment and my colleague's amendment, because both base their exemption on actual value of to-day.

Here is the language. I will read it again:

But such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

So that proposition has gone out of the window between these contending parties here.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not propose to ask the Senator about any of the technicalities along the line of exemption; but I want to get clearly in my mind why we should take into consideration, in fixing a pure war profit, the valuation of the producing plant or the capital stock.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We do not. I have not made myself clear.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, I notice that even the committee here, in its exemption, has now abandoned what theoretically was to my mind the correct basis of arriving at the real war profits. They have no reference to what the plant was worth. What was its earning capacity before the war? What is its earning capacity now? The difference between its earning capacity before the war and its earning capacity during the war differentiates the legitimate or normal profits from the war profits. Then impose your tax, or take whatever percentage you see fit of that difference.

What has the value of the property to do with the production of the war profits? The Senator and I know that there are some little plants with very small capital that in these war times, under the peculiar circumstances, are making a war profit almost equal to the value of the plant itself.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Some of them more.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; some of them more. Now, it seems to me that if we are going to take war profits, the simple plan would have been—the one that I thought had been invoked—to take as the basis of calculation what you made before the war and what you have made during the war, and then take a certain percentage of that surplus.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer the Senator's proposal. I think it is manifestly unjust to do so. In England, where industry is stabilized, where profits are about normal one year as compared to another, and there was nothing that upset those normal conditions except a war condition at home, you might ascertain with a reasonable degree of certainty a basis of war profits by deducting prewar profits from profits made during the war. But their conditions were very different from ours. If you want to take a prewar period to base it on, the question of the selection of that period may make or unmake hundreds of men.

When this proposition was first injected into this Congress—I do not mean by the committee, because I absolve the committee of any proposition of this kind—but when it first came here and was handed to us by its real proponents, who wanted legislation of this kind, what basis did they bring it on? They came down here advocating that the years 1914, 1915, and 1916 be taken as the basis of the prewar period. Of course, that was a prewar period so far as this country was concerned, but it was a war period as far as Europe was concerned. If that basis had been adopted—and I was told that it met with the approval of very large interests; undoubtedly it did—if that had been adopted, the men who had made their great fortunes out of the war with Europe in the last three years would have been entirely exempted from taxation under this part of the bill.

Now, the committee did not take those years. When that question came before them, they rejected those years; but that was the proposal of the hand that brought this proposal here. The committee took the next three years back behind 1914—1913, 1912, and 1911—as the basis. Well, probably if you are going to take a basis of that kind, 1911, 1912, and 1913 was about as good as any other basis. If they are going to take a basis of that kind, I am not criticizing them for taking those three years; but this country is so great, its industries have to meet such manifold different business conditions, that you can not take in this country any year or set of years and work justice either to individuals or to business enterprise.

Why, you might find during those three years, and you would if you applied it, great prosperity and great earning capacity in the automobile industry of this country.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one minute; allow me to finish this particular statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At that same time you would probably find that the lumber industry of this country was making no money; was flat on its back. Why, the Senator would find that that was true as to the cotton industry, largely, in his own State.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, right there, if the Senator will allow me—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me finish my explanation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But what I want to remark is so pertinent right here. If the automobile industry was making such an enormous profit, you could not charge that to the war. It was a prewar profit, and therefore they were entitled to that, and you ought to find some other form of taxation to reach it. It had nothing to do with the war, any more than the depression in the lumber business had anything to do with the war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, wait a minute; I am coming to that. Under those conditions, if you wrote an exemption proposition on the basis of these three years, you would exempt the automobile business and you would penalize the lumber business. You might have gone back three years before those which the committee took or six years before those which the committee took. I am sure I could pick three years back there where you would find that the automobile business was practically making no profit. It was in its infancy; it was unsuccessful; and yet in those same three years you would find the lumber business making great profit. Now, if you should go back and pick those three years, would you say it was just to exempt the lumber business and tax the automobile business? Therefore your equation depends on what three years you are going to pick, as to who shall be taxed and who shall not.

What I say is that when it depends on an equation of that kind, in view of its uncertainty, its doubt, its injustice, you ought to abandon it entirely. You can see, though, on the basis of this amendment, that every legitimate business on this year's earnings, if it can do so, is entitled to make 8 per cent before you commence taxing the war profit, and above that you can levy the taxes, small in your first bracket, until you have undoubtedly entered the domain of war profits, and then you ought to levy your taxes accordingly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have followed the argument of the Senator and have listened to the discussion here on the floor. These exceptions would come in even if there were no war and you proposed to tax incomes. You will find that even incomes fluctuate. The prewar condition of producing plants and individuals has nothing to do with the question that we are attempting to solve now. What we are attempting to do now is to find out how much excess profit is made on account of the war. If an automobile concern or any kind of factory made 100 per cent before the war, then the war is not responsible for that 100 per cent. If some corporation lost 50 per cent before the war, then the war was not responsible for the loss. We are not discussing what were the swollen profits of certain corporations before and up to the war. What we want to know is what has been their increase since the war began.

To illustrate, if an automobile concern made 100 per cent up to the war, and after the war began made 50 per cent additional, then we say that the 50 per cent additional to the 100 per cent was on account of the war and is subject to taxation under the principle invoked, which was that we were to tax war profits. If you tax the 100 per cent you are not taxing war profits; you are taxing normal conditions, which you tried to provide for in your income tax.

If the Senator will allow me, there is just one other matter that has been perfectly clear in my mind—that we are confusing abnormal profits before the war with war profits, and trying to put them in the same bag, and no committee can work it out without confusion.

There is one other point. If you are going to take the value of the property as of January 1 of the year in which the tax is to be collected, what business man is there in this body or elsewhere, if he were to go to sell his plant right now, but that would base its value upon its earning capacity now? A plant that is making to-day, by virtue of the war, 200 per cent on the investment, is worth 200 times as much as it was worth before the war began, if it was making no profit then, as long as the war lasts. You can arrive at no just conclusion in reference to what you ought to tax if you are going to take the value of the producing plant as of January 1 of the year in which the tax is laid, because its earning capacity is inflated; it is uncertain; it is certainly far above its earning capacity before the war, and you have injected another element of confusion.

I thank the Senator for giving me this much time. I had not intended to discuss the excess profits tax, because the committee charged with it has dealt with it. The Senator is an expert on these matters, as he was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House; but it is very clear in my mind that the excess war profit is a thing easily arrived at by any basis of calculation that is fair and just before the war, and then we can just simply tax the excess, without regard to the swollen profits in juxtaposition to the war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from South Carolina that I am willing to levy a large portion of this tax on war profits. I want to do so. I may not have made myself clear in my statement of why I do not believe the prewar profits basis is just and equitable and equally distributed; but I do make myself clear in this, and I must come down to the cases, as the printers say. I am not going to cast my vote for a bill or a principle that will give to the United States Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel plant, the Du Pont Powder Co., or concerns of that kind that have made enormous profits due to conditions that did not relate to their business, a complete exemption from war taxation, and put the burden of the taxation on the small businesses of this country; and that is what you will do if you carry out your plan.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I am making is this: If the Du Pont people and the steel people have, since the war began, made enormous profits as compared with what they made before the war began, why not levy whatever tax in our judgment we see fit, if necessary going to the point of drafting all their war profits? I shall not be put in the category of favoring these people getting an exemption.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the Senator's proposition is.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My proposition is this: "What did you make before the war? You have got that knowledge. What have you made since the war? You get that knowledge. Now, we will take, if necessary, all that you have gotten since the war." That is my proposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure. That is just what I say; and I know the Senator too well to believe that he stands on that proposition, because inevitably, if he stood on it, it would drive him to the position of exempting from taxation under this bill the class of corporations of which I was just speaking, because the facts show it. They are exempt to a large extent.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator this question: You have said they are exempt. How could you exempt them? Let us say they earned 50 per cent up to the time the war began. Let us say the Steel Corporation and the Du Pont people made 75 per cent net profit at the time the war began. They now make 150 per cent. It does not take a man versed in integral and differential calculus to figure out that they have made 75 per cent due to the war. Now, how much are you going to take of that?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If that was the condition, that result, as shown by the figures, a large number of these big corporations have made such prewar profits that under existing conditions they will be exempt from taxation under the terms of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But, Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I have been very good about yielding and would like to conclude my remarks. It would allow those men to escape from this taxation entirely. I do not say the particular ones that I named, but a large number of them would escape from this taxation.

If we have got to write a bill to tax war profits, and the only basis that we can find on which to base it is a basis that is going to allow certain very large business enterprises in the country to escape from this particular taxation entirely, then I am prepared to abandon, before I would accept such a proposition, the idea of a war-profits tax at all. I would come back to income taxes and I would multiply the returns by decimal numbers and get the money where it could be equitably levied. But it is not necessary to do that. You can say that business should have 8 per cent on its capital. There is no trouble about finding out what 8 per cent is. They are assessing taxes on property values in every State of this Union. The Secretary of the Treasury can do it, and the Committee on Finance recommends it by their last amendment. Then, above 8 per cent you can levy a small tax in the beginning so that you do not penalize or destroy honest profits.

But if some great concern was making 200 per cent on its profits before the war and comes in here and says it is now entitled to an exemption of 200 per cent on its profits, when the life of this country is at stake and its soldiers are on the battle line, the logic of the Senator's position may drive him to take that stand, but I say the equities of the situation and the equities and justice of taxation entitle such a position to be repudiated.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Now, if the Senator will allow me, it is not the logic of the Senator's position. It is keeping faith with what you are going to do. If you are going to tax war profits and you just come and take prewar profits and mix them up with war profits you will never know where you are. You will get some that made a big prewar profit and you will let your levy affect them, whereas the man who made no prewar profits is taxed according to his war profits.

Now, in order to be perfectly fair, to make my position clear, you have an income tax here. Why not graduate it? You have it as a separate section in the bill. It is not any use for us to try to confuse terms and thus confuse the public. We have a section here known as excess profits. Excess over what? Over prewar profits. We want to tax them. That is as clearly defined as the line of demarcation between these desks. Now, you have excess profits before the war began. That is an excess over what is justifiable. We need not confuse those terms. If some concern made 200 per cent before the war we certainly have ample legislation now under the income tax amendment to place such a tax upon those incomes as you see fit along the line that was worked out by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. Start with your swollen incomes and graduate it and exhaust that up to the war time. Then when you have taxed the normal, running right underneath the excess war profits, keeping right along, if you made $200,000 before the war and paid your income tax right up until now on the hypothesis that you are still earning $200,000, whatever is earned above put your excess war profits tax on, and so you have it on both issues.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to conclude?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Surely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator has now abandoned the position he took a minute ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because he wants to raise a part of this revenue by an income tax, which is in the bill, and about which I agree with him with all my heart, then when he gets up to the swollen profits he wants to slap the war-profits tax on without any exemption whatever. The purpose of putting this exemption in here is to let business move on and not penalize it. But the real basis must be, if you are going to levy taxes equitably and justly, on the present earning and present valuation. You never can invent a scheme of taxation that is going to be equitable and just when you reach back to make your assessment on values that may have happened 10 years ago and do not exist to-day. You can not make a just system of taxation when you levy your taxes based on earnings of 10 years ago or 3 years ago and not of earnings to-day. But you do that under the plan of the Finance Committee, because although your actual tax under the committee bill is not put on the earnings of the last three years, your exemption from taxation is put on that basis, and that reflects itself into the earnings of this year and allows the earnings of this year to be set apart.

The only fair basis, in my judgment, if you are going to allow this exemption, is to say what is a fair exemption, and then when you have established your exemption from war-profits taxation, tax all other men alike on the same basis in proportion to their earnings.

Mr. President, I do not desire to continue further, but I have in my hand a copy of an abstract of the various laws of the foreign countries in reference to war taxation. I ask that I may print it as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection it is so ordered.

APPENDIX.

WHY THE 3 PER CENT ON CAPITAL INVESTED BASIS SHOULD BE ADOPTED.

The committee report says the fundamental difficulty arises from the difficulty of establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested.

The committee further says that it "proposes the repeal of the existing war profits tax law and the substitution of a tax upon a basis similar to that followed by the European countries in which such taxation has been carried out with marked success."

The basis of the present law is to tax all profits in excess of (a) $5,000 and (b) 8 per cent on the capital actually invested.

What is the basis of the European countries for "establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested" which "has been carried out with marked success"?

A pamphlet has been printed for the use of the Finance Committee compiling the excess profits tax laws of Great Britain, Canada, New Zealand, France, Italy, Russia, German Empire, Austria, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Netherlands, and Spain.

Naturally one would suppose, in view of the statements made in the committee's report and of its conclusions, that the excess profits laws of the European countries which have been "carried out with marked success" avoided the difficulty of having to "establish a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested."

An examination of the document printed for the committee discloses:

GREAT BRITAIN.

Prewar standard being the average of any two of the last three prewar trade years selected by the taxpayer, except that it is not to be counted as less than 6 per cent (in case of business not carried on by a company or corporation, 7 per cent) on the capital invested at the end of the last prewar trade year.

CANADA.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits over 7 per cent of the capital employed in the business in the case of businesses owned by incorporated companies and over 10 per cent in case of other businesses.

NEW ZEALAND.

Basis of tax: Excess of personal income for war-income years over (1) income for any one (or the average of any two or all) of the three income years or (2) 7½ per cent on the capital employed by the taxpayer at the election of the taxpayer.

FRANCE.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits during war-trade years over prewar standard of profits; prewar standing being the average of three years before the war, but not to be counted as less than 6 per cent on the capital invested.

ITALY.

Basis of tax: Excess profits during war-trade years over the average of the amounts ascertained for personal-property tax for the years 1913 and 1914, but this average is not to be counted as less than 8 per cent on the capital invested.

RUSSIA.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits during war-trade years over the average of profits during the two years prior to the war, but this average is not to be counted as less than 8 per cent on the capital invested.

GERMAN EMPIRE.

Proposed basis of tax: The prewar standard is the average trade profits of the last five prewar-trade years, excluding the two years showing the largest and the smallest profits, if the company has been in existence as long as five years.

The prewar standard is in no case to be counted at less than 5 per cent on the capital invested, and this figure is to be taken if one full trade year has not preceded the war-trade years.

AUSTRIA.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits during war-trade years over prewar standard of profits; prewar standard being practically the same as in Germany, but in no case is the prewar profits to be less than 6 per cent on the capital invested.

NEUTRAL COUNTRIES.

DENMARK.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits during war-trade years over prewar standard of profits; prewar standard being the average of the two largest annual profits during the three trade years before the war, except that it is not to be counted as less than 5 per cent on the capital invested.

SWEDEN.

Basis of tax: Increased income of individuals or companies during war years over average income for 1913 and 1914, but the income of companies less than 5 per cent of capital invested is exempted.

NETHERLANDS.

Basis of tax: Increased income of profits during war years over the average for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913; income of companies not to be counted as less than 5 per cent on the capital invested.

SPAIN.

Basis of tax: Excess of profits over 7 per cent on capital invested. The only other European country referred to is Norway. The basis of tax is stated as follows: "Income increase of individuals or companies engaged in shipping, fishing, or mining over the average income for the two years 1912 and 1913. In case there was no income assessment for either of these years the income for 1916 is taken instead. The tax is computed only for that part of the income increase due to the European war."

Notwithstanding the assertion of the committee's report that it proposed "a tax upon a basis similar to that followed by the European countries" it is conclusively established by the state extracts of the laws of the European countries that the failure to provide an exemption or alternative prewar profit based upon a fixed percentage of the capital invested is contrary to the experience of the European countries in which "such taxation has been carried out with marked success."

It is apparent that the "fundamental difficulty" in "establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested" was not to any of the European countries such a difficulty. The committee while approving the workings of such exemptions or prewar profits in the European countries abandoned that principle when they came to apply it to our country.

To the list comprising practically all of the European countries should be added the United States because last March we approved the exemption plan based upon a percentage of actual capital invested.

So that it is a fact that the committee's report is against substantially the unanimous judgment of all the involved nations of the world.

The basis of exemption or plan for fixing the amount of pre-war profits as contained in Senator Bankhead's amendment has the approval of practically all the Governments of Europe, and in addition thereto Canada, New Zealand, and the United States.

The committee's bill has departed from the excess profits plan of the European countries in another highly important respect. The laws of the following countries specifically provide an allowance for increase or decrease in capital at a fixed per cent as follows:

Great Britain, 6 per cent for corporations, 7 per cent for individuals.

New Zealand, 7½ per cent.

German Empire, 5 per cent.

Austria, 6 per cent.

Denmark, 6 per cent.

Netherlands, 5 per cent.

The laws of all the other countries fixing the exemption at or not less than a fixed percentage on the capital invested thereby provide the basis for exemptions on increased or decreased capital as a fixed percentage on such increase or decrease.

Not a single European country establishes the method of fixing the exemption on increased or decreased capital which is proposed by the committee.

The committee's plan for such exemptions is found in section 203 and provides, in substance, that if the average capital is changed the exemption shall bear the same proportion to the prewar profits as the new capital bears to the old capital. In other words, if the prewar capital was $100,000 and the prewar profit was $20,000 and the present capital is $200,000 the present exemption would be $40,000. The practical operation of the law under this provision means that those who made more than the ordinary rate of interest during the prewar period and who have made large profits during 1913, 1914, and 1915, and who have added to their capital increase their exemptions, not at an interest rate on the new capital but in an amount which bears the proportion to the prewar profits which the old and new capital combined bears to the old capital. For illustration, if a company with $2,000,000 capital made an average prewar profit of $300,000, and during the European war has from profits or otherwise increased its capital to $10,000,000, its exemption would be $1,500,000.

If a new business was started since the prewar period with the profits from the above company, or with capital from other sources, its exemption would depend upon the profits earned by representative companies engaged in like or similar business as ascertained by the Treasury Department. If the same company distributing its profits in dividends and continued with its original capital, its exemption would be its average prewar profits unless it convinced the Treasury Department that its profits were low as compared with representative businesses in the same line, or that during the prewar period the ratio between the net and gross income was substantially less than the like ratio in case of "representative" businesses, in which event the proportionate exemption which such representative business was entitled would be accorded the taxpayer.

The most striking difference between the European laws and the committee's plan is the basis of applying the tax rate. In all the European laws the rate is applied to the amount of excess profits. In some of the countries a flat rate is used, while in a majority of them a graduated rate is used. In some countries the graduated percentage rate is applied to the amount of profit as the profits increase, while in others there is a graduated percentage rate applied to an increasing schedule of percentages or the capital invested, such as: On portion of excess profits over 10 per cent but not over 15 per cent on capital invested, 10 per cent; on portion of excess profits over 15 per cent but not over 20 per cent on capital invested, 15 per cent.

Careful search for a precedent for the committee's plan in applying the rate to proportion of the exemption instead of the amount of profit developed the interesting fact that in not a single one of the countries mentioned did the law contain any such basis, except that in Italy the committee's basis was applied for "commission agents" and none other.

It is rather remarkable that the plan adopted by the unanimous accord of all the other Governments should be rejected and a basis used alone by Italy and applying only to a negligible proportion of their taxpayers should be adopted for the use of this great American Nation.

The committee has not attempted to apply the rate of taxation "upon a basis similar to that followed by the European countries," and it has no substantial precedent for its remarkable plan of basing the tax upon the proportion which the taxable profits bear to the nontaxable property.

There is no similarity in any respect between the laws of the European countries and the committee's plan. In Europe the tax is called a tax on excess profits. The committee changes its name to war profits.

In Europe the rate is applied to the amount of excess profits. Under the committee's plan the tax rate is applied to fixed proportions of the exemption.

In Europe if there were no prewar profits, if the business was not in existence during the prewar period, the basis of exemption is a fixed percentage on capital invested.

Under the committee's plan under such circumstances the basis of exemption is the profits of representative business.

In Europe if the capital is changed, allowance is made at a fixed percentage.

In the committee's plan under such circumstances allowance is made in the proportion that the present capital bears to the old capital.

In Europe if the profits were subnormal during the prewar period exemption is based upon fixed per cent upon the capital invested. Under the committee's plan under such circumstances the exemption is decided by the prewar profits of "representative business."

In Europe the exemption is either the prewar profit or the fixed per cent upon capital invested, in no case to be less than the latter.

In the committee's plan various methods of fixing the exemption are provided:

- (1) The average prewar profits.
- (2) If the prewar profit was subnormal the proportionate profits of "representative" companies may be adopted.
- (3) If the business was not in existence during the prewar period the prewar profits of "representative" business of like or similar kind is to be used, provided that unless 6 per cent on the capital invested has been earned there are no war profits.
- (4) If there has been a change in the capital employed the amount of the exemption changes in the proportion that the average capital for the taxable year bears to the average capital for the prewar period.
- (5) If a business had no net income during the prewar period then the "representative business" basis is not to be used in fixing the exemption.

It is impossible to make a reliable estimate of receipts under the committee's plan because no one can approximate how many taxpayers will get out of the class of "prewar-period profits" and into the class of representative companies and individuals engaged in a like or similar trade or business.

The Treasury Department must not only determine the proportion which war profits of representative corporations, etc., bears to the total net income of the trade or business received by such corporations but it must also determine what are like or similar trade and businesses.

Under this plan it may be found that the war profits of a farmer are 50 per cent of his net income, while the war profits of a banker are 6 per cent and a railroad 10 per cent and a munition plant 20 per cent.

The exemption or deduction from taxation would vary according to the percentage of profit made by representative concerns in different lines of business. The amount of the exemption would not depend upon any fixed or uniform basis, but would depend upon what line of business was involved and upon the profits made by "representative businesses" in that or similar business during the prewar period. How far located from the site of the business involved the returns from other businesses may be considered in determining the proportion which the prewar profits of representative companies bore to their net incomes is left wholly in the discretion of the Treasury Department.

In ascertaining whether a wholesale shoe business in St. Louis had a subnormal prewar profit, would the Treasury Department take into consideration the profits of similar businesses in Massachusetts, Illinois, or would it confine the consideration to companies in like business in Missouri? That would be left to the discretion of the Department upon its decision in all the cases submitted to it under section 205 would largely depend the amount of taxes to be collected as war or excess profits tax.

There would be no end of litigation if the courts have power to review the findings of the Treasury Department in its findings: (1) what business is of like or business kind; (2) what were the prewar profits of representative companies.

Notwithstanding the abhorrence of the committee of the "difficulty of establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested" the bill provides for the ascertainment of the capital in two important contingencies:

(1) If the net income of a business for the taxable year which was not in existence for a whole calendar year during the prewar period is less than 6 per cent on the average capital actually employed, there shall be deemed to be no profits. (Sec. 204, page 17, line 23 et seq.)

(2) In every case where there has been a change in capital since the prewar period either by increasing or decreasing, there must be an ascertainment of the average capital employed not only during the prewar period, but also for the tax year.

It is submitted that very few businesses would fail to come under one or the other of the above classifications.

The amendment (Bankhead's) is a reenactment of the present law in all respects except that it fixes a graduated rate instead of a flat rate, thereby making large excess profits pay more in proportion than small excess profits.

The practical operation of the Senate plan is to secure a basis of exemption increasing with increased prosperity, while the amendment will work to secure taxes increasing in amount with increased prosperity.

The Senate's plan works in the interest of big business, while the amendment shifts some of the burdens of war taxation from the shoulders of little business to the shoulders of big business, where it properly belongs.

Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Senate. After he had spoken some time,

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hitchcock	McCumber	Simmons
Brady	Hollis	McNary	Smith, Md.
Brandeggee	Husting	Martin	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	James	Myers	Smoot
Culbertson	Johnson, Cal.	Nelson	Swanson
Curtis	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Thompson
Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Townsend
Fernald	Kellogg	Overman	Trammell
Fletcher	Kendrick	Owen	Underwood
France	Kenyon	Page	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	King	Penrose	Weeks
Gerry	Kirby	Polndexter	Wolcott
Hale	Knox	Saulsbury
Harding	La Follette	Shafroth
Hardwick	Lewis	Sheppard

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from North Carolina will proceed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I regret exceedingly that the action of the Finance Committee with respect to the pending bill displeases the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], formerly chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, and for three years Leader of the House.

The Senator makes some caustic and very unjust criticisms of the Finance Committee. Indeed, some of his criticisms amount almost to an indictment of the motives of the committee. They are both unjust and ungrounded.

I regret that the present action of the committee should not have the approval of the able Senator as I have regretted that its action with respect to other revenue legislation reported by it since he has been a member of this body failed to receive his approval.

The Finance Committee has devoted weeks and months in painstaking and laborious efforts to master the facts of the present financial and revenue situation and to frame a bill which meets present revenue requirements equitably, distributing the burdens of taxation, at the same time permitting the business and industry of the country to prosper and meet quickly and adequately the pressing demands of the Government in this war emergency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I hope the Senator will not—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am sure the Senator from North Carolina would not make a statement in the Record that is not sustained by the facts. I have supported many provisions of the Finance Committee's bill since I came here. Many bills I voted for without an exception. I know of but two marked cases in the past in which I have differed with the Finance Committee in its bills reported to the Senate, and I am sure that the Finance Committee to-day would not take the action that they took then if the light of subsequent events were before them. I told the Finance Committee when they brought the bill before the Senate some time ago creating a tariff commission that they were wasting $300,000 and would accomplish no result. The commission itself says there is no work for it to do at this time. I told the committee when they brought in an enormous tax on dyestuffs that it would accomplish no good and would result in a monopoly, and since that time the organization has created the monopoly, and even the men who were favoring that provision of the bill have been complaining against it since that time.

That was the opposition that I voiced to previous bills brought in by the Finance Committee. Except those I do not recall any opposition on my part to any of the Finance Committee bills in the Senate and I would be glad if the Senator would call them to my recollection.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator refers to his opposition to certain features of legislation heretofore proposed by the Finance Committee and says that he warned the committee that its proposals would result in no good results. That is true. The Senator was open and frank in his position. But the fact remains that his attitude with respect to certain features of revenue and tariff legislation proposed by the Finance Committee in the past as now has been one of criticism and opposition.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator must pardon me. His memory lapses. At the time the Senator brought in the tariff bill, the only tariff bill that has been brought in, in years, I was in the other body representing another body, and of necessity I stood for the House bill and not for the Senate bill. But that did not occur in this Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not refer to the tariff bill of 1913. I referred to the revenue bill of 1916, which contains certain important features and provisions relating to the tariff.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not remember any tariff item, and I would be glad if the Senator would point it out. I challenge his statement. The provisions for the Tariff Commission and the tax on dyestuffs were the limit of my opposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going to enter into details. Every Senator here knows the attitude of the Senator from Alabama regarding the revenue and tariff bill of 1916.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator just pardon me a minute? I want to tell the Senator I have supported many of these bills, but if he brings in a bill here that in my judgment is manifestly wrong, does the Senator think that I, because of the mere fact that I happened to be chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, should sit in silence and allow his bill to pass without criticism if I think they are not the bills that should pass the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have said nothing of the kind. I merely expressed regret that the Finance Committee is and has been unfortunate in not having the approval of the Senator from Alabama, a very distinguished authority upon tariff and financial questions, of some of its important proposals with respect to these matters.

The Senator from Alabama says that he desires that wealth pay these war taxes. I believe we will all agree that wealth ought to pay the bigger part of these war expenses. I feel that the bill which the Finance Committee has presented to the Senate will require wealth to pay not only a large part but the great bulk of these expenses. The Finance Committee agrees with me in this opinion as its action shows. In this bill out of a total of about $2,600,000,000 more than $2,000,000,000 is levied by the Finance Committee's amendment upon the incomes and the profits of the wealth of the country. I repeat I agree with the Senator that wealth should pay the bulk of this tax, but, Mr. President, before I shall have finished I think I shall be able to show that under the amendment which the Senator is now advocating large wealth will not pay a fair proportion of these taxes. I believe I shall be able to show that the plan the Senator now presents will not only inadequately reach the large aggregations of wealth in this country, but that it would largely permit the very rich to escape either altogether or with an inadequate burden.

Mr. President, it is true the committee has twice modified its original amendment. But on both occasions the modifications have been the result of changed conditions with respect to the revenue situation creating a demand for additional revenue and higher taxes. The bill as now reported to the Senate after striking out between four and five hundred millions of dollars in the House bill, largely in the way of retroactive income and tariff taxes, will, it is estimated, raise something over $2,500,000,000. A half a billion of this amount is added as the result of two recent amendments reported to the Senate. One of these amendments increases the maximum graduated rate from 50 per cent to 60 per cent and imposes a limitation upon super-normal prewar profits of 10 per cent.

The Senator criticizes these latter amendments. He prefers a flat 8 per cent upon invested capital as a measure of normal profit for the purpose of fixing the taxpayer's exemption. He does not like the committee plan of fixing the taxpayer's normal profit upon the basis of his actual earnings during the prewar period, and he does not like the maximum limitation the committee proposes to impose upon the exemption so ascertained.

As between the Senator's proposition and that of the committee with respect to these matters, I do not see how anyone who thoroughly understands the facts and the situation can agree with him. But the Senator says that the committee in modifying its original proposition by imposing a maximum and minimum limitation upon prewar profits surrenders and recedes under fire. The Senator is mistaken about that. There has been no surrender on the part of the committee. It has not receded from the principle of the original bill. It has simply modified that principle and extended it so as to meet a demand of the Senate and the country which has grown up largely since the original report of the committee, and is due very largely to the enormously increased estimated expenditures for 1918, as well as to meet a manifest desire of Senators in raising this additional revenue that the bill should be made an excess profit as well as a war profits tax. The recently reported amendments are not inconsistent with the original plan of the committee.

In its original action the committee assumed the Congress and the country desired that a large part of the needed revenue should be raised from war profits—on profits due to the war. It sought, therefore, to make the tax distinctively a war profits tax. It sought to do that by permitting the taxpayer to have an exemption from the tax of whatever profit he was making before the war. That scheme of course provided a large exemption in cases where the prewar profits were large. Many Senators felt that in the face of the present demand of the Government for revenue there should be some limitation placed upon the exemptions where profits before the war were supernormal. In other words, they thought it should not be altogether a war profits tax, but to some extent an excess profits tax.

In placing upon prewar profits a limitation of 10 per cent on the invested capital your committee have in effect converted its original plan into a composite scheme, making it both a war profits tax and an excess profits tax.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggests a flat rate of 8 per cent—a rigid rate which will apply alike to every taxpayer without regard to what he was making before the war. It is inflexible. It gives the taxpayer who is engaged in a business in which ordinarily the risk is comparatively small and the profits certain the same rate as the taxpayer who is engaged in a hazardous business where the rate of profit must of necessity be larger if the business is to live and prosper. He makes no differentiation between these two cases. The committee amendment provides a differentiation by allowing as an exemption the actual profits of each taxpayer for the prewar period, but prescribing a minimum and maximum rate of 6 and 10 per cent. As a result of these changes in the committee plan, in many cases, the amount of exemption will depend upon the amount of capital invested, just as in the case of the proposition which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] supports.

Capitalization therefore becomes important and vital in both schemes, and for that reason the definition to be applied in ascertaining the amount of invested capital for the purpose of determining the exemption becomes of prime importance. Especially is this so when we consider the basis upon which the great corporations are in many instances capitalized. Therefore the amendment which the Senator from Alabama advocates and the amendment proposed by the committee necessarily require that there should be a definition of invested capital. The definition proposed in the two cases are in their potential effect upon the exemption allowed the taxpayer radically different and will materially affect the possible revenue from the taxes it is proposed to levy.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I merely want to ask the Senator to read the two.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am going to do that in a minute.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The clause in the bill on which the exemption is based—

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I am going to do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And the other clause defining actual value. He will find the language is very much the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President, it is radically, fundamentally different.

When we passed the present excess profits law, that of the act of March, 1917, the House sent us a definition of capital which the Senate committee thought was inadequate and which would probably result in allowing many of the big corporations of the country that were making enormous profits to escape. In reporting that bill back to the Senate we proposed amendments which we thought would largely safeguard against that difficulty. Unfortunately, a situation was created in the Senate which forced us to abandon all of those amendments, and the bill was adopted without amendment and became law just as it had passed the House. But when the House came to deal with this question during the present session, in the pending bill they enlarged the definition of capital which they made in the act of 1917. The House definition of capital and the definition of capital which your committee proposes for the purpose of the exemption are, in substance, the same with a provision added by your committee to further safeguard the revenues against excessive and unfair exemption.

The House new definition seeks to squeeze the water out of overcapitalization before permitting the application of the 8 per cent exemption it allows. It recognizes the fact that the law now on the statute books did not do that, and they have tried in their amended definition to remedy the defect. Your committee did not think they had altogether succeeded, but your committee thought that they had in large measure succeeded. We adopted what they had done and then supplemented it with an amendment of our own, and we believe with this further emendation the object desired will be accomplished in the main, if not altogether. This is vital, Senators, and, I desire the attention of the Senate. This is the committee amendment.

Mr. OWEN. From what page and line is the Senator reading?

Mr. SIMMONS. From page 16, beginning at line 6, in the amendment offered yesterday evening by the committee:

SEC. 207. As used in section 203 and in subdivision (b) of section 204, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in—

The Senator from Alabama has eliminated the words "paid in"—

(2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment.

The Senator from Alabama has eliminated the words: at the time of such payment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to explain in a word why it is necessary to eliminate those words?

Mr. SIMMONS. It was necessary, of course, to cut them out upon the basis of the definition provided in the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There can be no value without it is in the corporation; it has got to be there. But if you leave in the words "at the time of such payment" you might include a lot of watered stock; you might include assets which at the time of organization were classed as assets but are not assets now. It is very clear that if you leave in the words "at the time of such payment" you might give opportunity to somebody to base value on water; but when you strike those words out and say "actual cash value," that clearly fixes the actual value of the property.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can discuss that after I have put before the Senate the two amendments. Mr. President, let me proceed with presenting the amendments. The committees' definition, I will say in passing, seeks to ascertain what property had come into the hands of the corporation, and to fix the valuation for the purposes of corporate capitalization at the price paid at the time of the acquisition. I shall show you before I get through that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama in ascertaining the capital for the purpose of exemption, fixes the value, appraises acquired property at its selling price of the taxable year, its market value to-day, without any reference to what it was worth and cost at the time the corporation acquired it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Let me see if I understand the Senator, because I do not want to differ with him. The Senator, in his statement, has just said that the Bankhead amendment seeks to fix the value of the assets as they are valued to-day. Was I correct in that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; you seek to value the assets of the corporation—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As they are fixed to-day?

Mr. SIMMONS. As they are fixed to-day, without any reference to what the corporation paid for them.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I agree with the Senator on that, and I think that is the correct basis. That was the intent. If those assets are worth more to-day than they were when the corporation was organized, they ought to have that value. If they are worth less, if there is watered stock in the corporation, it ought to be eliminated. There is no confusion about my position on that point, because I agree with the Senator fully. The effort is, in the Bankhead amendment, to levy the exemption and the tax on the basis of actual value as it exists to-day.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senate definition and that of the House take account of the cash that has been paid in, and of property taken in the place of cash, and also prescribe that the property shall be valued as it stood at the time it was purchased by the corporation. The Senator from Alabama does not follow that course, and I will show you what it will lead to if we adopt his amendment and his definition of capital.

Mr. President, I have been diverted. I was about to proceed with reading the amendment defining capitalization in the House bill and as amended by your committee. I think I had better start from the beginning and read anew that definition.

SEC. 207. As used in section 203 and in subdivision (b) of section 204, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership is not to be included unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

Mr. President, the overcapitalization of corporations of to-day consists largely of arbitrarily and fictitiously valuing trade-marks, trade brands, good will, etc. The water that is in their capitalization consists largely of the fictitious valuation of these intangible things. No definition of capital which does not safeguard against abuses in connection with the valuation of these things can possibly furnish a basis of a just and fair and sound valuation of actual capital invested.

The proviso in the House bill seeks to control and regulate the valuation of these intangible things. The manifest purpose is to squeeze the water out of overcapitalization. In the definition of capitalization proposed in the amendment which the Senator now advocates (the Bankhead amendment) this saving proviso of the House bill is omitted also. There is no effort whatever in that amendment to place any limitation or restriction upon the valuation of these intangible things.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, since the Senator is quoting me, I shall be glad if he will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. We have a different point of view on what it means. According to the definition for which the Senator is standing, if you have a corporation existing to-day that has capitalized itself with water in it, of course the House definition excludes certain things, but in many other cases where it has capitalized itself with water in its stock you would base your values on that capitalization, which I think is unjust. Under the Bankhead amendment, on the other hand, it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain the actual value. Now, if he ascertains actual value, what difference does it make what the value is composed of, if it is actual value, and that is just and that is fair? But if you buckle yourself in, and carry yourself back to the date of capitalization, there is no telling what you have got tied in behind the fence.

All I want is for every man to stand on the same basis. The Bankhead amendment puts it on the basis of the actual value of to-day. No man can complain about that, if the Executive honestly and fairly carries out the law, and only allows actual value. That is the whole proposition; and therefore I say the Bankhead amendment is the juster one.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Finance Committee's definition of capital, being the same as the House definition, furnishes a rule for valuing these intangible assets—valuing them at what they were actually worth when acquired by the corporation—just as it furnishes a rule for valuing property taken in place of cash—at what the property was worth when acquired by the corporation. The definition of the Senator from Alabama, which I will presently place in the record, furnishes no rule or guide. It is simply a flat proposition and values the property of the corporation for the purposes of ascertaining the capital at what it would sell for now—at the high prices which now obtain, with all of the unearned increment since it was actually acquired added.

After I have read to the Senate the amendment proposed by your committee as an additional safeguard to the definition of capital contained in the House bill, I will read the definition of capital in the Bankhead amendment which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is now advocating in full, and then I will attempt more fully to present to the Senate the radical differences between the two amendments and show the effect of these differences upon the capitalization and the revenues expected from the proposed taxes. Now let me read the amendment to the House definition proposed by your committee. It is as follows:

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable satisfactorily to determine the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period or the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year, the war profits shall be determined as provided in subdivision (a) of section 204—

Section 204 provides for ascertaining what the average profits were in similar lines of business.

Mr. President, under those amendments, if the Secretary of the Treasury has reason to believe that the capital of such corporations as are now making profits that run up into the hundreds and thousands per cent over what they were making during the prewar period is inflated, that the capitalization claimed by them does not represent actual value as defined, does not represent the capital of the concern honestly and fairly; and if further he finds difficulty in applying the rule laid down by the House and reaching a satisfactory valuation, he can say to that corporation: "Either squeeze out your water, and give us a just basis upon which we can value your property for the purposes of the exemption that you are asking from taxation, or I will ascertain what tax you should pay by subjecting you to the rule of exemption based upon the average profits in the business in which you are engaged."

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the Chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Is not one effect of these excess profits or war profits to take stock that originally was nothing but water, of no value, and to give it, for the time being, a status and a value that it never had before?

Mr. SIMMONS. That depends on the definition you give in your law to invested capital. I wish a definition which prevents frauds on the revenues through fictitious valuations.

Mr. NELSON. Is not that one of the effects? For instance, take the United States Steel Corporation. It is conceded by everybody that its common stock was originally all water. I believe, before the war period, some of it managed to pay, for a short time, slight dividends; but the effect of these excessive profits during the war has been to bring up that stock, which was originally water, and to give it a market value that it never could have had without those excessive profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would, I think, be the effect under the definition of capital which the Senator from Alabama advocates. The definition is very brief, and I fear, as framed, will allow many of the greatest corporations of the country to escape the payment of anything like their adequate contribution to the expenses of the war. Let me now read to the Senate the exact language of the definition of invested capital contained in the amendment of the senior Senator from Alabama (Mr. BANKHEAD), which the junior Senator from that State (Mr. UNDERWOOD) is so ably advocating:

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him a question? He has himself brought in here an amendment for a deduction based on capital, and he states in his amendment:

But such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Now, I should like to see—

Mr. SIMMONS. I say that in the application of that everything depends upon your definition of invested capital.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. To be sure; but—

Mr. SIMMONS. I have given you the committee's definition of actual capital; and I say that under that definition the water which is in the capital of these great corporations will be largely squeezed out; further, under the Senator's definition you not only do not squeeze it out, but you inject a large amount of additional water.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, in the first place his amendment does not relate to his definition. His definition relates to a condition that was not capital, because he had no capital in this bill before he put this last amendment in here. His amendment was relating to an exemption proposition based on a prewar condition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. He comes in here now and defines a new exemption, which he says is either 6 or 10 per cent on the actual capital invested as of January 1 of that year. Now, there is no difference between that and the Bankhead amendment. After saying the actual cash, it says "the actual value of all assets other than cash." Now, how could "actual value" be water?

The Senator from North Carolina erects a dummy man to explode. When you put the basis on actual value, no man can sustain the statement that the Senator from North Carolina has just made. "Actual value" can mean nothing but actual value, and could not mean a padded return, as the Senator from North Carolina intimates.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator had been patient he would have found out exactly what I mean if he did not anticipate it, and he does not seem to have anticipated it.

The great corporations of this country to-day were not organized during this year or during this war. They were organized before the price of practically everything in this country had gone up to the sky. Most of them were organized when prices were normal, when the values of the properties which they purchased or which they took in the place of cash were moderate. When you allow them, for purposes of exemption, the values of their properties when acquired and upon which their capitalization was originally based and has continued to be based up to the present time, you have done all that they have a right to ask you to do in fixing this exemption.

What does the Senator's definition of capital do? Now let me read the exact language of the definition of capital in the Bankhead amendment. I have tried several times to read it, but each time when I have been about to read it I have been interrupted. It is very short, and I think very defective, so far as safeguarding the Government in the matter of the taxation proposed. It is as follows:

SEC. 202. That for the purpose of this title, actual capital invested means: First, actual cash, and second, the actual value, of all assets other than cash, used or employed in the business; but does not include money or other property borrowed by the corporation or partnership.

First, it specifies actual cash; second, the actual value of all assets other than cash, not when paid in as in the House bill, not when paid in as in the Senate amendment, but the actual value of assets other than cash, when? To-day. In this taxable year.

Take the United States Steel Corporation. In the beginning, when it was organized, enormous properties were bought, scattered from one end of the country to the other—coal mines, iron mines, iron and steel works, railroads, steamboats. They bought these properties at the prices then going. They bought or built steamboats to transport their ores and their coal across the Lakes and to their different plants. Under the House bill and under the Senate bill, when we estimate their capitalization we will consider the values that they actually paid then for these properties. But to-day the prices of iron ore and of steel and iron are very high—probably three, four, five, or six times higher than they then were. Their boats, built originally, purchased at moderate prices, now by war conditions enhanced five hundred or a thousand per cent.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me—

Mr. SIMMONS. The railroads that they constructed then cost little compared to present prices of construction and have increased enormously in value. When you go to assess their value under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, as I construe it—and I believe I construe it absolutely correctly—you would value their mines and their boats and their railroads at the prices of to-day. War prices—prices that reflect only abnormal and transient conditions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not want to have any difference with the Senator, but the Senator has made a mistake in writing his amendment. I should like to have him amend his amendment so that we will know what it means, because I do not want to vote on a proposition without knowing what it means. If the Senator really intends to go back, as he said a moment ago he did, and base the exemption on the values at the time of the organization, that is a different thing; but if he intends to stand by his amendment, I want to know how he can construe this language:

Not * * * less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

The actual capital invested as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How can the Senator stand before the Senate, with that amendment here, and say that that definition carries it back to the capital invested when the corporation was organized, when you do not say "when it was organized," but you do say "the capital invested as of January 1 of the taxable year?" No definition can get you out of that proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I said. We based it upon the capital invested in the business on the first day of January of the taxable year; but in the other part of the definition, which the Senator very carefully fails to read, we declare that in ascertaining the value of the amount of that capital, if there is any property in it that represents cash, such property shall be valued as at the time of the transaction.

The Senator has said that it is impossible to administer a law containing a definition of capital such as that which we propose. The objection may be easily answered. Our definition of capital is in substance the definition employed by the English law, and this has been successfully administered for three years. The Senator says it will not work. The answer is that it has worked and is working in England.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But then you violate your own definition. If you say that you are going to take it at the value of the assets on January 1 of the taxable year, that means value. If you are going to go back and say that you are going to take it on the proposition of what it was incorporated at—maybe it was trade-marks or enhanced values or a thousand other things, and we know the United States Steel Corporation was incorporated at probably three times its value—if you are going back there to put it on that basis, how can you say that your definition that was originally in the bill can relate to a proposition when you say here that it shall be the actual invested capital in the taxable year? One proposition is in direct contravention of the other; and as this is the governing proposition in the bill, and the other relates to other parts of the bill, of necessity this definition of the basis of capitalization, where you fix the rate of exemption, is the one that is going to prevail.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, to my mind the thing is too plain to permit of argument. I think it is necessary to consider the two amendments together, and I do not believe there is a lawyer in this body, or in the United States, who would say the amendments mean what the Senator has stated, or that will not interpret their meaning as I have.

If I correctly interpret the meaning of the Senator's amendment, it is that the Secretary of the Treasury would be required to make an original valuation of all the property of these corporations. He is to ascertain the value of their assets of whatever kind or character, wherever located, however employed in the business, estimated on the basis of 1917. Mr. President, if you do that, you will have a case like this: You will have the United States attempting to secure a part of the war profits of a big corporation by taxing them, with the big corporation offsetting the claims of the Government by the enormous war enhancement in its prices. "Oh, yes; I have made big profits, and you say you are entitled to a part of them, but you say I am entitled to an exemption upon my capital. My assets, you say, are my capital, representing the value of my assets to-day. The price and value of my assets have been growing proportionately to the amount of my profits. Against these big war profits upon which you seek to levy I offset the increase in the value of my assets as the result of the war which you are to make the basis of my exemption under your bill." That is the kind of case which would be presented under the amendment advocated by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama if he denies that proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, of course, I deny that assets are advancing as well as profits.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But does the Senator deny that his proposition is to fix the 10 per cent, or whatever exemption is to be had, upon the actual value of the assets of the company of the date of the assessment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Why, certainly not. Do they not do that in every section of the United States? Does not the State in which you reside, the county in which you live, the municipality in which your home is located fix the basis of taxation on that very value? Of course, the proposition in this bill is to make the exemption which really relates to the tax on the actual value, not a padded value. Now, I have no doubt that values change. What the Senator has said in reference to increased profits making to some extent increased value I do not controvert; but to say for a moment that values in this country will follow the enormous profits that some corporations are making is absurd, because everybody knows that when this war is over those profits will go down. But if they are making the profit, and the money is in the Treasury, and the cash is there, they have got the value invested in their business.

Of course, I think the Senator's recent amendment—he may have done so inadvertently, and probably has, from what he states—carries him to exactly the proposition that is in the Bankhead amendment. The reason why I say that actual value as ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury is a fairer basis of computing your tax or your exemption, whichever way you put it, than going back and taking capitalization, which the committee want to do, is because you know and I know that a vast number of the corporations of this country have been overcapitalized. They are loaded down with watered stock; and the committee want to take as a basis of their exemption or their taxation the overcapitalization and the watered stock that you find in a certain class of the corporations of this country.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I beg the Senator's pardon, but I should like to confine my question to one feature, and not to interfere with the argument of the Senator from North Carolina. I am not arguing the Senate committee's proposition; I am arguing the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, without any comparison with anything else. As I understand it—and I can not get anything else from it—the Senator from Alabama proposes to base his exemption upon the inflated prices of the properties now in existence.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, not at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And, in my judgment, that would yield no revenue worth considering at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all. I do not propose to base it on inflated prices.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask the Senator a question. This bill says "actual value." Inflated prices are a very different proposition from actual value.

Take one of the great steamship lines. They have boats which they bought many years ago, and which they are operating now. Would not the Senator, in his amendment in valuing their assets, include those boats at what they are worth to-day?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Surely. Would you?

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator if they would sell at ten or twenty times as much to-day as they cost the corporation when acquired by it. Would he capitalize them upon the basis of this enhancement?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not necessarily so. I do not know that. They may be worth twenty times as much, and they may be worth more. But how are you going to get a just basis of taxation or any basis other than actual value? There is no other basis. You may point out any discrepancies there, you may point out a very great rise in value over what a man has, you may point to a man who has found a gold mine which, by reason of its product, has greatly increased in value, but if the world recognizes any other basis of just taxation than actual value I have never heard of it before to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a short statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to bring before the Senate in almost a word the difference between the two amendments. I can recall to my mind a business that started 10 years ago with $100,000 capital that because of the peculiar character of the business is to-day making $1,000,000 annually or 1,000 per cent upon its capital invested. Its business could be sold to-day for $10,000,000 because it is earning a million dollars a year, or 10 per cent net. Under the bill as reported by the committee you would tax, after deducting 10 per cent, 90 per cent of the earnings of that business. Under the proposition urged by the Senator from Alabama because of the value of the assets, say, to-day $10,000,000, and it is earning $1,000,000, you would give it an exemption or a reduction of 8 per cent and would tax 2 per cent. So the difference would be between taxing 90 per cent as the basis of your taxation and taxing 2 per cent of the profits.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Is that corporation in your State?

Mr. McCUMBER. That corporation is not in my State. We do not have that kind in my State. It may be in Alabama. I will not say.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not in Alabama; I know. If it was in your State would you favor that corporation being assessed for taxation under your local law at the original 100 per cent, or would you insist that it should be assessed for taxation and taxed at the rate of its present value?

Mr. McCUMBER. I would insist in a war emergency that if it only had an actual value of $100,000 invested and it was making $1,000,000 upon its investment it should pay 90 per cent of that enormous profit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am asking the Senator if he would for the purpose of local taxation say that the corporation should only be taxed at $100,000 instead of at what the property is now worth?

Mr. McCUMBER. We are seeking to-day to lay a war tax upon profits. I would have no tax at all upon the profits, probably if they were not excessive in my own State, because we have not as yet—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator does not answer the question.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the difference is this. Under the Senator's proposition because of the enormous increase in profits your base value has increased 5 and 10 and 100 per cent, and you would take that as a basis of exemption rather than the real basis of exemption which would be the profit upon the actual investment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator has not answered my question and he could not do it, because if he did he would say he would tax property in his own State on real value and not on the original purchase.

Mr. McCUMBER. I answered it when I said that I would for war purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator would for peace purposes. It would apply justly although there might be a hardship where you levy taxes on the real value. I could go through the books to-day and show you innumerable instances where, if you take capitalization instead of real value you are going to let a large number of men escape taxation. When you come to absolute justice although you may show a hard case on both sides no man can deny that actual honest value is a fair basis of taxation.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, as I understand this matter the objection made by the chairman of the committee to actual value, so-called, is because in these war times the enormous profits fix actual value, if you choose to term that at present market value, and for that reason the high earnings invested in capital in this time of war would make such an exemption excessive. Is that correct?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I mean to say this. There would be the question of water in the stock in determining at the present time the capitalization of a concern which, for instance, purchased a number of vessels at a very low price when the market was low. You would allow them the price they paid for those ships when they bought them and not the enormous increment resulting from war conditions. Not base it upon this temporary war inflation.

Now, take the Steel Corporation for instance. Their earnings last year were $271,000,000 upon their present capitalization of $1,700,000,000. So they made less than 20 per cent of their capital. Now, the Steel Corporation is possessor of some of the most valuable mines in this country. I believe some of them are in the State of Michigan. Others are scattered throughout the States bordering the Lakes. During the panic of 1907 the corporation went into Tennessee and other Southern States and there, under the distressed conditions resulting from the panic, bought at nominal prices and now have many iron and coal mines. The cost was comparatively small.

Now, if under the Senator's amendment the United States Steel Corporation is to have its capital appraised on the basis of values of these properties assessed at the prices of this war period, is it not evident that instead of a capital of $1,700,000,000 it might be found to have a capital of twice that amount based upon the same assets. And instead of exempting 8 per cent upon the present capitalization there would be an exemption of 16 per cent upon the present value of assets.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that aside from the mere question of valuation we ought not to overlook the fact that the substitute you offered yesterday only applies in cases where the corporation did not exist before the war while the amendment of the Senator from Alabama applies to every case. It would apply to the Steel Corporation, to a powder plant.

Mr. SIMMONS. One of them applies to new corporations. But another applies to corporations generally.

Mr. NELSON. It would apply to every corporation while this proposition, aside from the dispute as to what is meant by the word "value," would apply to any of these big corporations that have been making excessive war profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I previously called attention to the fact that the Senator from Alabama did not put in his definition of capital either the proviso of the House bill with regard to valuation of good will, and so forth, or the proviso or any of the additional precautionary provisions that are contained in the supplemental amendment made by the committee to the House definition of corporate capital.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Do I understand the Senator from North Carolina to say that under his amendment watered stock is taken out of corporations before allowance is made for the deduction?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Secretary of the Treasury will follow the directions he will get the information.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Let us suppose the stock of the United States Steel instead of having a capitalization of over a billion would be reduced to $500,000,000 in round numbers on account of the watered stock. The whole issue of common stock is watered. I wish to know from the Senator if he thinks that is taken care of. I think it is a well recognized fact that the Steel Corporation—

Mr. SIMMONS. It is, I think.

Mr. KIRBY. I should like to suggest this illustration of the difference between two amendments to the Senator. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KIRBY. It will take just a minute.

Say one man has undeveloped coal or timbered lands worth $50,000; another, machinery and cash of like value. They organize a corporation with a paid-in capital stock of $100,000 and proceed to the development of the mine or the manufacture of the timber. Their business thrives and increases, without any increase of capital stock, until the corporation's assets are worth $500,000. The market value is that sum.

Another corporation, capitalized at $500,000 and the actual value of its assets being that amount, operates alongside the first.

Now, under the provisions of this bill and amendment, is one corporation to be taxed or exempted from taxation on the basis of $500,000 of value and the other upon $100,000 of value, the amount of its capital stock, when both corporations occupy the same position and have assets of equal value? Both are worth the same.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand the Senator's illustration. Does the Senator refer to the committee amendment or the amendment of the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KIRBY. I was just trying to find out the basis in considering the value whether it would be allowed the same on the $100,000 as on the $500,000 corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. You would be allowed what the property was worth at the time it was put in business, as representing so much money plus earned surplus and profits put in the business.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what I understood.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what the House bill does, that is what the Senate committee bill does, but that is not what the amendment of the Senator from Alabama does.

Mr. KIRBY. That is what I understand. Then it would be figured the one on the basis of $100,000 while the other would be allowed on the basis of $500,000 when both have exactly the same value.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator from North Carolina can not possibly mean that. I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say from the earnings of the company they have put in from year to year additional capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course that is different.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Earnings have increased, and what has been put in from them becomes a part of the working capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course the Senator understands that the accumulated earnings and the undivided profits would be included in estimating capital invested. That is specifically provided for in the definition in the Senate amendment.

Now, Mr. President, bad as I think the method of the Senator from Alabama for ascertaining the value of capital would be, his plan of imposing the tax upon the excess earnings is even more objectionable.

In the Senator's plan he assumes that 8 per cent of the capital invested is the measure of the taxpayers' prewar profits. Of course the assumption is an arbitrary one, but that is the way he proposes to determine the prewar profits of the taxpayer, and I am not now complaining or criticizing that. Having ascertained the prewar profit in this way, the Senator imposes taxes upon a graduated scale measured by the increase in earnings on the basis of capitalization. That is to say, he deducts 8 per cent from the capital invested as representing the normal profits exempt from taxation. Upon the next additional 5 per cent, 8 per cent, 10 per cent, etc., increase in earnings based upon capitalization he imposes a graduated tax. Under this scheme the rate applied in the amendment he advocates, when the additional increase amounts to 8 per cent of the capitalization he imposes a tax of 10 per cent; that is to say, when the taxpayer has doubled his prewar earnings the tax imposed upon this basis would only be 10 per cent. Under the graduated rate of the committee amendment when the taxpayer has increased his prewar earnings 100 per cent the tax imposed is 30 per cent. To illustrate: A corporation with $1,000,000 would be entitled to an exemption under the amendment supported by the Senator from Alabama of $80,000, that being 8 per cent upon the capital; if it shall make an additional 8 per cent (another $80,000) the Bankhead amendment would impose upon that $80,000 a tax of 10 per cent. Under the amendment of the committee, if this corporation was earning 8 per cent, or $80,000, during the prewar period and it earned during the taxable year an additional $80,000 it would have to pay upon that amount a tax of 30 per cent. That is to say, if the taxpayer under the Bankhead amendment makes 100 per cent profit during the taxable year over that of the prewar period he pays 10 per cent, while under the committee amendment when he makes 100 per cent additional profit he would pay 30 per cent. The difference is that the committee applies its graduated rate to the per cent of increase in the profits in the taxable year over that of the prewar year and the Bankhead amendment applies its graduated rate to the per cent of increase based upon capitalization, and when the taxpayer is making 100 per cent more during the war period than he made during the peace period he is taxed under the Bankhead amendment at the rate of 10 per cent and under the committee amendment at the rate of 30 per cent.

For further illustration, let us take the United States Steel Corporation. It made during the year 1916 a net profit of $271,000,000 upon an aggregate capital of $1,700,000,000. Eight per cent upon this capitalization will amount to, in round numbers, $140,000,000—that is the amount of exemption it would be entitled under the Bankhead amendment. It earned in addition to the amount exempted, in round numbers, $140,000,000, or an additional 8 per cent upon its capital. Under the Bankhead amendment it would pay at the rate of 10 per cent upon the additional amount, while under the Senate committee amendment it would pay at the rate of 30 per cent upon that additional amount.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer. I wished to take only sufficient time to make it perfectly manifest that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, judged either from the standpoint of the basis of exemption or that of the proposed method of imposing a graduated tax, does not put the burden of this horrible war upon the rich man, but it either lifts that burden off the rich man or paves the way by which corporate ingenuity and skill can easily so manipulate as to lift it.

I appeal to Senators who have not examined the bill to take the bill home with them and to study it in its details. They will find, in my judgment, Mr. President, that it is a scientific and well-adjusted scheme which takes care of the equities of the situation; that it properly distributes taxes. We tried to divest ourselves of those prejudices and impulses which lead to class legislation and often unjust discriminations, and levy these heavy taxes with even-handed justice. We have looked the situation squarely in the face. We have tried equitably to distribute this burden among the rich and the poor alike, requiring each to contribute only according to his ability.

I believe from the bottom of my heart that the rich man, the man who is making enormous profits out of the war, ought to pay the great bulk and volume of this enormous burden that is now bearing down so oppressively upon the shoulders of the American people; but I believe just as strongly, Mr. President, at this time, and in the conditions which confront our country, the common interest and the patriotic duty require that every man, rich or poor, should pay his part, according to ability, however much or little, to the cause for which we are waging this war. It is no time to say that because a man is not making a big income he shall not pay any tax. It is an indictment of his patriotism to say, "In this hour of stress, this hour of trial to your country, this or that man should for this or that reason be expected to contribute nothing toward the expenses incident to the great undertaking in which we are engaged." I want everybody to contribute in proportion to his ability and no more.

But, Mr. President, over and above this, I appeal to Senators here to recognize the situation. We must have men by the millions, and these men must have clothes; they must have arms and equipment; they must be fed; and they must be cared for when sick or wounded and buried if they shall die in defense of their country. We must incur enormous expenses in preparing and equipping for effective service the great army we are to raise. We must have an enormous quantity of money as well as men. We must have a large production from our factories, our mines, our fields, and our forests. More factories must be built—old ones must be enlarged—everything must be done to stimulate productivity. Money is required to do this.

Tax the industries of the country as heavily as they can stand and continue to prosper. Do not pass this maximum point, for when you go beyond it there will remain no inducement for investment. To overtax the industries is to pursue the foolish course of drying up the stream at its source—of killing the goose that lays the golden egg—of destroying both the industry and the source of revenue for the Government.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before the Senator from North Carolina takes his seat I desire to make a suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator pardon me? I am so completely exhausted, I feel that I can not hold the floor longer.

Mr. HOLLIS. But it is absolutely essential, Mr. President, that we consider the cloture rule which we are going to vote on to-morrow.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. HOLLIS. The cloture rule provides that—

Except by unanimous consent, no amendment shall be in order after the vote to bring the debate to a close, unless the same has been presented and read prior to that time.

There are many amendments—I have several myself—which I have presented, but which have not yet been read. In my judgment, unless something is done to handle this situation this evening we can not get a two-thirds vote to-morrow. I appeal to the chairman of the committee at this point to ask for unanimous consent to bring the debate to a close, and to have a vote next week. I have a hope that if he will tender that request unanimous consent may be granted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me ask a parliamentary question. Is it necessary under this rule that the vote shall be taken immediately upon the assembling of the Senate?

Mr. HOLLIS. One hour after the session opens; and that is not time in which to read all the amendments that are to be presented.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that hour may be cut short if the Presiding Officer desires to do it. If you will read the rule, you will find that he has an hour in which to lay it before the Senate. He can do it the first thing when the Senate convenes, if he wants to.

Mr. HOLLIS. And he can recognize some one who may talk the whole hour.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that to meet that situation, instead of asking for a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, I had it in mind to ask for an adjournment until 12 o'clock.

Mr. HOLLIS. That will not change it at all. It says "one hour after the meeting."

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the vote would not be taken until 1 o'clock. The Senator can prepare his amendments by that time.

Mr. HOLLIS. The amendments are prepared; but there are so many prepared now that have been printed that they would take more than an hour to read.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not necessary that they should be read.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; it is. They must be presented and read. I will say to the Senator that although I signed the petition to have the rule invoked, unless some relief is given, I shall not vote for cloture to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment that I ask to have read by the Secretary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, would it be in order now to ask unanimous consent that any amendment offered to-morrow shall be in order, notwithstanding any action that may be taken with reference to this rule?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the rules provide how a rule shall be changed, and I do not think that rule can be changed by unanimous consent. The rule is very specific on that point, and says it shall be one hour after the Senate convenes on the second calendar day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Secretary to read the amendment that I have sent to the desk, which I offer under the cloture rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 4, commencing with line 14, it is proposed to strike out all down to and including the word "provided," in line 23 on said page.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, some days ago I offered the amendment which I now send to the desk. In view of the imminence of the cloture rule, I ask that it may be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from California proposes the following amendment:

Strike out all of section 201 and insert the following:

"Sec. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax) equal to 73 per cent of the war profits determined as herein after provided.

"For the purposes of this title all the trades and businesses in which a corporation or partnership is engaged shall be deemed to be a single trade or business, and all its income from whatever source derived shall be deemed to be received from such trade or business."

"This title shall apply to all trades or businesses of whatever description (whether continuously carried on or not), including the business of rendering any services for a commission or of acting as an agent of any description, except—

"(a) An office or employment, including that of a commercial traveler or agent whose remuneration consists wholly of a fixed and definite sum, irrespective of the amount of business done or any other contingency; and

"(b) A profession the profits of which depend mainly on the personal qualifications of the individuals by whom such profession is carried on and in which there is not required the investment of more than a nominal capital."

Mr. RANDELL. Mr. President, I offer three amendments, which I desire to have read by the Secretary and considered as pending, to be considered at the proper time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent, under the so-called cloture rule, that amendments may be offered at any time during to-morrow, provided cloture is adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in my statement before I stated that unanimous consent could not be had on such a request; but I have noticed since that the rule itself provides that by unanimous consent amendments may be offered. Therefore the request made by the Senator from North Carolina is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the request of the Senator from North Carolina? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. BROUSSARD. I ask that the amendments I send to the desk may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Louisiana offers the following amendments:

On page —, line —, insert the following:

"Any person, firm, or corporation that shall seek to evade the provisions of this section by deducting from the vendor of cane or beets or sugars sold for refining, by contract or otherwise, the amount of the taxes herein provided, for each offense shall be subject to the penalties provided in section 305."

Also insert the following at the end of Title XI:

"Sec. 1107. That section 5 of the act approved March 3, 1917, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918,' shall not be construed to apply to ethyl alcohol for governmental, scientific, medicinal, mechanical, manufacturing, and industrial purposes, and the Postmaster General shall prescribe suitable rules and regulations to carry into effect this provision in connection with the act of which it is amendatory."

Also, on page 86, line 10, after the word "importer," strike out all of paragraph (d) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) Upon (1) all hard refined sugars, commercially known as loaf, cut-loaf, cube, or powdered, seven-eighths of a cent per pound; (2) all granulated sugar which has undergone a process of bone-black refining, commercially known as standard granulated, five-eighths of a cent per pound; (3) all granulated sugar made from beet juice, commercially known as beet sugar; granulated sugar made from cane juice which has not undergone a process of bone-black refining, commercially known as plantation granulated; and all soft sugars the result of bone-black refining, four-eighths of a cent per pound; (4) all sugars made from cane juice, which has gone through a process of clarification, testing higher than 96° by the polariscope, commercially known as clarified sugar, three-eighths of a cent per pound; (5) sugars made from the juice of cane or beet, and not falling under the above classification, two-eighths of a cent a pound, all to be paid by the refiner, manufacturer, or importer.

"All sugars mentioned herein imported from foreign countries shall pay in addition to any import duties imposed thereon the tax provided by this law on like articles now manufactured in the United States and its possessions."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and offer certain amendments, which I ask may be read according to the rule and printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to inquire, if by unanimous consent these amendments may be offered to-morrow, whether we may not by unanimous consent agree now that they may be offered, lie on the table, and be printed and considered as read, and not read? If that is so, I will ask the chairman to ask unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I make that request for unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to hear it stated.

Mr. PENROSE. The request is that the amendments can be offered without being read.

Mr. BRADY. Let the request be stated, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is possible that, with another Presiding Officer in the chair, a point of order might be raised that that is not a compliance with the rule, and some of these amendments shut out, and I do not want to take any chances upon that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I will say, for the information of the Senator, that perhaps in a few minutes an amicable adjustment of this matter can be arranged in the form of a unanimous-consent agreement; and if he will withhold his request for a few moments perhaps we can accomplish something.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have three amendments that I ask may be considered as pending and be read, if the rule requires them to be read now.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico will state it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understood the chairman of the committee to ask unanimous consent that any amendments may be offered and read to-morrow with the same force and effect as if read to-day, notwithstanding the fact that the cloture rule may be adopted to-morrow. Am I correct in that understanding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the way the Chair understands it. The Chair understands that the cloture rule provides that those amendments may be read under unanimous consent to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As I understood the chairman of the committee, he asked unanimous consent that any amendments may be presented to-morrow and read to-morrow with the same force and effect as if presented and read to-day. I should like to inquire whether or not there was objection to that unanimous-consent request, and whether or not it was granted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that there was no objection, and that that request was granted by unanimous consent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then any amendment may be presented and read to-morrow?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the rule specifically provides that no amendment shall be in order unless presented and read prior to the adoption of the cloture rule, excepting that they may thereafter—that is, after the cloture rule has been adopted—be presented, and, if not objected to, or if unanimous consent is given, they may be offered. That being the rule, I do not feel any certainty that you can change it, except by filing a motion 24 hours in advance of the time and making the change.

My attention was diverted. The leader upon the Democratic side [Mr. MARTIN] had engaged me in conversation, and I did not understand that any unanimous-consent proposition was being submitted to the Senate. He was talking with me about adjusting the matter of the time of closing debate, and my attention was diverted for the time being; and if there is any uncertainty about it, I should like to have it removed. I do not set myself up here, Mr. President, as an infallible judge of parliamentary law. I just do not want to be misled.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know there is no intention to mislead anyone. I do not mean to imply that.

Mr. SIMMONS. There can not be any doubt about it. I made the request. The Chair announced that there was no objection, and I said—I expect I said it loud enough to be heard—"The unanimous-consent agreement is made."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, again and again when the submission of a unanimous-consent agreement has not been heard by Senators who have been present the request has been again submitted. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] will verify my statement if any verification is needed. We were engaged in conversation there at the time that occurred, as I have since learned.

Mr. MARTIN. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Therefore, Mr. President, unless I can be assured that there is not any doubt about the unanimous consent protecting everybody, I want that unanimous-consent proposition submitted again to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was standing right where the Senator from Idaho is now standing and I heard the Chair say, after putting the request of the Senator from North Carolina, "Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered." I heard him make the formal statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am not questioning the record. I am simply saying that the leader upon the Democratic side came to me to submit to me a proposition for unanimous consent to close the debate some days later, and when I was so occupied this unanimous-consent provision was placed before the Senate, and I did not hear it. Now, I venture to say that again and again on this floor, when any Senator has asserted immediately afterwards that he did not hear the unanimous-consent proposition submitted to the Senate, it has been submitted over again.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, as I understand, all the Senator desires is to be assured that this unanimous-consent agreement will be effective for the purposes that are expressed in it. He is satisfied with it unless it can be invalidated.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For the purposes expressed in it by the Senator asking it. I think it was the Senator from North Carolina who asked it.

Mr. MARTIN. Exactly; and the Senator desires to be assured that as he asked it, it was granted.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes. I should like to hear from some of the recognized parliamentarians of this body as to whether that rule can be so changed.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not pretend to be one of the recognized parliamentarians of the body, but I can say that I have not the slightest doubt about the effectiveness of that unanimous-consent agreement. It will prevail, and no one can prevent it from prevailing, and all that was asked in it will be respected by the Senate, and will be of necessity respected. The Chair would so rule, and the Senate would so sustain. I have no doubt about the effectiveness of that unanimous consent for everything that it undertook to do.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on the parliamentary point nothing is clearer than that a body can do anything by unanimous consent. We suspend the rules. We go contrary to the rules. We suspend and set aside the rules every time we introduce a bill here out of order. You can suspend any rule by unanimous consent. This rule, as it happens, contains an express provision for its suspension by unanimous consent. There can not be any doubt—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but, if the Senator will pardon me, this is not the time when that express provision can have application. It can only have application after the rule has been adopted, when unanimous consent can be given, under the rule, for the introduction of amendments.

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, the rule can be suspended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, Mr. President, I will withdraw the request to have it submitted over again, since there is any demur about it.

Mr. MARTIN. There will not be any doubt about it, Mr. President. It will be effective. No Senator would object to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there are some amendments pending which perhaps have not been read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read them.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that the unanimous-consent agreement provides that these amendments when offered will be treated as having been read. If that is so, I do not ask that these be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota insist upon having his amendments read?

Mr. McCUMBER. They would have to be read even though they were offered to-morrow. They have now been offered, and I ask that they be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendments.

Mr. KING. The Senator from New Hampshire submitted a request for unanimous consent that the reading of the tendered amendments might be dispensed with.

Mr. HOLLIS. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will ask unanimous consent that all amendments now pending may be considered as read and will be pending and subject to be voted upon if the cloture rule is adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator means "now offered" instead of "now pending." If the Senator will change his wording to read that way, I think it will be all right.

Mr. HOLLIS. My attention was diverted. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator used the term "all amendments now pending." What the Senator means, I think, is all amendments now offered. They will not be pending until they are offered.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask unanimous consent that all amendments offered to-day or to-morrow be considered as offered and pending and as having been read under the cloture rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. Without present reading?

Mr. HOLLIS. Without present reading.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Do I understand that amendments not yet introduced may be introduced to-morrow and offered to-morrow and they will be in the same category?

Mr. HOLLIS. My request covers all amendments offered to-day and to-morrow to the pending bill, that they will be considered as offered and pending and as having been read under the cloture rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. I tender an amendment and ask that it lie on the table under the rule stated by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer a number of amendments to the bill. They have been presented and printed. I offer them so as to avail myself of the unanimous-consent agreement which has just been entered into by the Senate in regard to amendments offered, should the cloture rule be adopted.

I also offer a substitute bill under the same provision of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I offer an amendment, to lie on the table.

Mr. KENYON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask that it lie on the table for the present.

Mr. BRADY. I offer the following amendment to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I offer two amendments to be proposed to the bill that they may be printed and considered as read and lie on the table.

Mr. HALE. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. NEW. I offer two amendments which have been previously printed, in order that they may be considered pending under the agreement.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment under the unanimous-consent agreement just entered into. I ask that it may lie on the table.

Mr. HOLLIS. I send to the desk four amendments to the pending bill under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I offer the following amendment to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. RANDELL. I submit an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

Mr. GORE. I offer two amendments to the pending bill, which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments which have been sent to the desk will lie on the table as requested, and those which have not heretofore been printed will be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senators who are present, now that the confusion that has been in the Chamber for some time has subsided, to give attention for just a few moments while I furnish information to the Senate showing what the proposed committee amendment will raise in revenue and the amount under each bracket of the last committee amendment. I have been requested so many times to-day to give that information to individual Senators that I feel, although it is time for adjournment, that I should present the figures to the Senate before adjournment so that they will be in to-morrow morning's RECORD.

I intended to speak upon the so-called Bankhead amendment, but it is too late to do so to-day; but if I get the time to-morrow I shall go into the details of that amendment and compare it with the committee amendment, and I think I will be able to show that the amount of revenue that is to be collected under it will not be anywhere near what the Senator offering the amendment expects, and will not bring the amount of revenue that the committee amendment will produce.

Now, beginning with the first bracket of the committee amendment, the amount of revenue to be collected will be $100,080,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does the Senator mean under the 12 per cent bracket?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the 12 per cent bracket. If the Senator will take the bill, I will, as I did on the first committee amendment, state the amount that will be collected under each of the brackets and then Senators can compare the revenue that would have been raised under the first committee amendment with the one under consideration. Under the 12 per cent bracket there will be $100,080,000.

Under the next bracket, 15 to 25 per cent, there will be collected $46,080,000.

In the 25 to 50 per cent bracket there will be $109,000,000; from 50 to 75 per cent, $101,000,000; from 75 to 100 per cent, $88,200,000.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator changed his form. He first started out with the 12 per cent bracket and then he changed, and it makes a good deal of confusion.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator can not follow it in that way, I will name the percentages instead of the amount of increase.

Mr. STERLING. Can not the Senator from Utah follow the amendment last offered by the committee, beginning on page 6?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought Senators had their copies of the bill marked and they would like to have the amounts I will name marked on the bill and not on an amendment, so they could compare them, and it would save time. The Senator from Nebraska said that it is hard to follow when I mention percentages of increases rather than the percentage of tax. So I will begin over again:

On the 12 per cent bracket there will be collected $100,080,000.
On the 16 per cent bracket there will be collected $46,080,000.
On the 20 per cent bracket there will be collected $109,000,000.
On the 25 per cent bracket there will be collected $101,000,000.
On the 30 per cent bracket there will be collected $88,200,000.
On the 35 per cent bracket there will be collected $120,050,000.
If I am going too fast, I will pause.

On the 40 per cent bracket there will be collected $102,000,000.
On the 45 per cent bracket there will be collected $84,150,000.
On the 50 per cent bracket there will be collected $72,500,000.

Then the balance of the brackets, as the amendment now is proposed, will be what will be termed the 60 per cent bracket, the additional bracket as proposed by the committee, and under that bracket there will be collected $462,940,000, making a total to be collected under the committee's proposed amendment of $1,286,000,000.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator give the first three brackets again?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. On the 12 per cent bracket there will be collected $100,080,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask the Senator if that is the increase in the bill or the total tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the total tax that will be collected under the bill, and just as soon as I give the figures asked for by the Senator from Iowa I will state what reductions there are.

Under the 16 per cent bracket, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, the amount collected would be $46,080,000, and under the 20 per cent bracket there would be collected $109,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. The exemption provided for in the amendment offered last night varies between a minimum of 6 per cent and 10 per cent. How is the committee able to determine just what amount will, in fact, be exempted between those two figures?

Mr. SMOOT. The only way that that can be arrived at is to take an estimate based upon the returns made to the Treasury Department for the years since the corporation tax has been imposed, and from those returns find the amount collected within each bracket named, and whether the percentage of gains were 6 per cent or below or 10 per cent or above, then average the percentage within each bracket named. Of course, in all these estimates, I will say to the Senator, it is not absolutely sure that the figures named will be the exact amount, but they are approximately correct.

Mr. POMERENE. We understand that, but you have a minimum and a maximum. What I am trying to get at is what rule has the committee adopted whereby it determined whether there would be an exemption of 6 per cent or 7 per cent or 8 per cent or 9 per cent or 10 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. That is easily arrived at. On companies earning less than 6 per cent, they are to be allowed 6 per cent or the average of companies doing a like business, but not to exceed 10 per cent. On companies earning above 10 per cent not to exceed 10 per cent. The annual returns show the capital stock of all corporations as well as the profits made since the year 1909. The exemptions to be allowed between 6 per cent and 10 per cent, I will say to the Senator, has to be an estimate, and that estimate, of course, is arrived at on the basis of former returns.

Mr. POMERENE. That is what I wanted to know. If I may ask the Senator another question, Did the committee attempt to ascertain what the amount of revenue would be provided there was a straight exemption of 6 per cent or of 8 per cent or of any other specific amount?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that would be easily ascertained, but I will say I have not the figures because I did not know that any Senator would ask for the same.

Mr. POMERENE. Some days ago I asked the expert for an estimate on that subject, but I have not yet been able to ascertain it. I would be very much obliged to the Senator if he would have those figures for us in the morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator it is not possible for me to do it to-night, together with the other matters I have to attend to.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that the Senator has been very busy and I am not asking him to do it. I was in hopes that as a member of the committee he could get those figures from the expert.

Mr. SMOOT. I will see if I can do so.

The $1,286,000,000 is the total to be raised under Title II of the bill, but from that amount is to be deducted $226,000,000, in order to show the additional tax to be raised, as we repeal the present law, known as the munitions tax, from which there was collected from the munitions manufacturers for the year 1916 $226,000,000. When I say there will be collected $1,286,000,000, that is what will be collected under this title, but it is not in addition to what has already been collected on excess profits; or, in other words, we deduct the $226,000,000 that was collected under the present law, leaving an additional amount to be collected under the title of $1,060,000,000.

Mr. STERLING. In other words, under this bill there is no distinctive munitions war tax?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. All corporations, all partnerships, and all individuals doing business are upon the same basis.

Mr. NEW. That is simply the extra profit now under this section of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I designate it as excess profits instead of war profits, yet in the greater number of cases the excess profits have been made on account of the war.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand that this is an entire abandonment of the war-profits feature?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not necessarily so. It is not an abandonment of the war profits, but it is adding to war profits excess profits. The change in the committee amendment is such that we will collect taxes from any corporation or individual or partnership doing business in the United States that makes more than 10 per cent profit for the year 1917.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the committee was induced to make the change on account of the criticism the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] made when I closed my remarks on the bill, that a concern might be making an enormous income during the prewar period and a similar enormous income during the taxable year, and escape taxation under a strict interpretation of the war-profits tax. It seemed unfair to many Senators that that condition should exist, and as a concession to that sentiment, and on account of the fact that it was evident we were required to raise all the revenue that we possibly could, we took care not only of the subnormal situation but of the super-normal and put the limitation of 10 per cent on the maximum amount to be deducted. In that way many of the leading automobile concerns in the country and other large establishments which would have escaped taxation under a strict war-profits system logically worked out came in for their fair share of these burdens. That is the reason why the committee modified it. But the whole structure of the war-profits tax provision remains, with a protection to a concern having subnormal earnings and a restraint on the concern having supernormal earnings.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the result remains just the same, that few big corporations make more than 10 per cent, and the little corporations and the little partnerships with the partners earning the money, and not their capital earning it, are going to be penalized under this provision.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator from Minnesota is mistaken as to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator would more accurately state the matter if he should say that the tax is upon all profits above 6 per cent or 10 per cent, as the case may be, which includes, of course, war profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is putting the answer in a different form, but I have no doubt that the amendment now offered by the committee will tax not only all of the war profits but will tax excess profits of all corporations whose profits for 1917 exceed 10 per cent no matter what rate of profits they made during the prewar period.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] was first on his feet, and I yield to him.

Mr. KELLOGG. I merely want to say one word.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not want to be misunderstood. I think the committee's plan is much better than that of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I do not see how the latter amendment can be defended in this respect; but the result is just as I have stated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that to-night I do not want to go into the discussion of that question, because I expect to speak upon it to-morrow. What the Senator says, however, to a limited extent is true, that some of the small concerns of the country made a very low profit during the prewar period and will make a very large profit for the year 1917 on account of the war, and in such cases the percentage of increase might be greater upon such small concerns referred to than the percentage of increase upon some of the larger concerns of the country. Therefore, the tax being placed upon the percentage of increase, the small company referred to would pay a larger percentage tax in comparison to the amount made than would the larger concern, and why not?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that this amendment, which has only been introduced to-day—

Mr. NELSON. It was presented yesterday.

Mr. BORAH. Well, late yesterday, but I saw it for the first time to-day—fundamentally changes the entire principle upon which the war-profits tax features of the bill are constructed?

Mr. SMOOT. I would not say that it changes fundamentally all of the principles of the bill as first reported, but there is one change I will say to the Senator from Idaho that I—

Mr. BORAH. But that one change fundamentally changes the principle upon which the entire war-profits tax feature of the bill is constructed.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me state in a few words what it really does, and then I will say to the Senator that I will let him judge as to whether or not it does fundamentally change the whole principle of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. When the bill was introduced it was constructed upon the English theory, taking as a basis certain prewar years. The committee has abandoned that, have they not?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BORAH. They have practically abandoned it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we have added to the amendment which the committee offered to the House provision in the first place and have made it conform nearer to the English system.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but in the committee's original proposition they left out that portion of the English scheme which covered an exemption of 8 per cent upon the investment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. Now the committee have reconstructed it and inserted that principle, have they not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true in a modified form.

Mr. BORAH. So, as between the bill as originally introduced and as it now stands with this amendment there is a fundamental change which makes it necessary to go into the question of capital.

Mr. SMOOT. In certain cases; yes.

Mr. BORAH. Then, if that is true, does it not do precisely what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] says, namely, bear more heavily upon small corporations than upon large corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. No; Mr. President, it does not, unless the small corporations as a whole make a greater percentage of increase in profits. I will, however, say to the Senator from Idaho that if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is adopted, his criticism will be absolutely just; but in the amendment offered by the committee the rate of taxation is not based upon the amount of profits made, but upon the percentage of increase which is made. So if the small company makes an increase in profits of 50 per cent and the large company makes an increase of 50 per cent, then they are absolutely on the same footing; they are taxed at the same rate.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. It seems to me it is a mistake to presume that only small companies had lean years during the prewar period. The use of the phrase "small company" is a misnomer. Some of the largest concerns in the country had equally lean years during the prewar period. If there is any inequality, it applies to the enormous concerns that had no business at all to amount to anything, as well as to the little ones. It is impossible to so frame a law as to meet all conditions with mathematical accuracy; but to say that it is an apparent discrimination only against the small company is not taking in the full situation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Pennsylvania is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator indulge me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I have given a great deal of attention to these bills, as it was my desire to try to protect the varied interests of my State; and I have done a good deal of work, which all had to be abandoned because I discovered that my premises were wrong and therefore my conclusions were incorrect because of the constant introduction of new amendments. Thus all my work has been rendered futile. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah, if it will not burden him at this moment and if he can answer without entering upon too long a discussion, to let me know what is the basis now upon which the word "excess" is predicated as distinguished from the words heretofore used, namely, "war profits." The Senator now speaks of excess profits.

Mr. SMOOT. The difference is that as the Senate committee first reported the bill the amount to be taxed was arrived at by ascertaining the average earnings of the corporation during the prewar period. Those years were 1911, 1912, and 1913. For the year 1917, the first year to which the bill will apply, financial returns are to be made and all profits over and above the average for the prewar period were to be taxed as war profits.

Mr. President, the committee found that there was a strong sentiment throughout the country that if we simply fix the prewar period as the basis of exemption of the amount of profits made by the corporation and do not provide a maximum exemption many of the very largest business institutions in the United States would entirely escape taxation. For instance, there is the Ford Automobile Co., whose average prewar earnings were just as large as were their earnings for 1916, and it is estimated that their prewar earnings were more than will be their earnings for 1917; and under the first amendment offered by the committee that company would not pay a dollar of excess or war profits for the year 1917.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read—

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from North Carolina desires to submit to the Senate a proposed unanimous-consent agreement. In order to have action taken upon it the roll will have to be called. Therefore I shall ask the Senator to allow me to continue, as I want to say a few more words, and then I shall yield the floor, with the understanding that I may continue my remarks to-morrow.

In further answer to the Senator from Illinois I wish to say that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama makes a flat exemption of 8 per cent upon the capital and surplus employed in the business. The committee amendment as submitted yesterday makes a minimum exemption of 6 per cent, with a maximum exemption for any corporation in the United States of 10 per cent. If the Senate adopts the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama, and grants an 8 per cent exemption, I doubt whether there will be more than three or four railroads in the United States that will pay one cent of taxes for the year 1917. There are other large concerns in the country that have not made upon their capital more than 8 per cent during the prewar period, and will not make more than 8 per cent for the year 1917, particularly is this true of the banks and mercantile companies, and yet their profits in many cases amount to millions of dollars. Under that condition, if the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama were adopted, the Government would not receive a cent of taxes from such corporations.

Mr. POMERENE. Now, Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator. The committee, in considering this question, thought that there ought to be a minimum 6 per cent exemption, and that there ought to be a maximum of 10 per cent. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that the reason for the maximum is that there are businesses in the United States that are rather hazardous; they often make 10 per cent or more—

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before that suggestion is acted on I will ask that I may file a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will withhold that motion, I will be through in a moment.

Mr. PENROSE. I will suggest to the Senator from Utah that the Senator from North Carolina desires to submit a request to the Senate. I meant no discourtesy to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the desire of the Senator from North Carolina, and I was about to conclude.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am afraid we will lose a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I will conclude by stating to the Senator from Illinois that to-morrow I will discuss the whole question in detail.

Mr. LEWIS. I will appreciate the Senator's courtesy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is necessary to have a quorum in order to act upon the proposed unanimous-consent agreement which I desire to present, and I am told that Senators are leaving.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator ought to present the proposed agreement and have the roll called afterwards—

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly; but I was afraid we would lose a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. And not call for a quorum before the proposed agreement is presented, as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. PENROSE. I withdraw my suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I send to the Secretary's desk and ask to have read a proposed unanimous-consent agreement providing for a vote upon the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the motion for cloture be withdrawn, and that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Tuesday, September 4, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending and any amendment that may be offered and undisposed of to Title II, War-profits tax; that thereafter the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of Title I, War-income tax; and that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Friday, September 7, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending and any amendment that may be offered and undisposed of to the said title; and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Saturday, September 8, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question for information? The Chair probably can not answer the question, not having knowledge of the transaction. While this bill was pending in the committee I tendered an amendment in which I sought to lay a tax on unoccupied and unimproved land, not embodying, as many thought, the full features of what is known as the "single-tax system," but upon the theory that unimproved and unoccupied land should be taxed at this time to help maintain the Government, either by way of affording an inducement to force the improvement of the land so that agricultural results might be obtained to support the soldiers or to penalize those who would hold their lands unoccupied, and obtain from them a tax for the Government. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if he can tell me now whether the amendment to which I have referred is upon the table and whether under the proposed unanimous-consent agreement I will have a right to have a vote on it? I have no desire to debate it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will have a right to offer that amendment at any time before the bill is voted upon.

Mr. LEWIS. The amendment has been tendered and sent to the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. The committee did not accept that amendment, but the Senator can offer it at any time.

Mr. LEWIS. Assuming that the committee rejected it, as I assume they did, may I ask the chairman of the committee if I will have a right to have a vote on it in the full Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Lewis	Shafroth
Bankhead	Hollis	Lodge	Sheppard
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Simmons
Borah	Johnson, S. D.	Myers	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smoot
Fernald	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Fletcher	Kellogg	Overman	Sutherland

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-four Senators have responded to their names—not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. JAMES, Mr. KIRBY, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, Mr. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. VARDAMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are necessarily absent on account of death in the family of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. MCKELLAR, Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. NEW, Mr. WOLCOTT, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. WILLIAMS, and Mr. CURTIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there has been a slight change in the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, and I will ask that the Secretary state the changes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the tendered amendments.

The SECRETARY. It is agreed by unanimous consent that the motion for cloture be withdrawn, and that at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Wednesday, September 5, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending and any amendment that may be offered and undisposed of to Title II, War-profits tax; that thereafter the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of Title I, War-income tax, and that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Friday, September 7, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending or that may be offered and undisposed of to the said title; and that at 4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, September 10, 1917, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest that the hour of 2 o'clock on Friday for voting on the income tax be changed to 4 o'clock. I suppose the Senate will want to take a recess when that is through, anyway.

Mr. SIMMONS. I consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is at liberty to perfect the agreement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator proposing this agreement—I could not gather this from the terms of the agreement as it was read—whether it would prevent the Senate, if debate runs out, from having an earlier vote than the time named in the agreement?

Mr. SIMMONS. It says, "Not later," Mr. President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The agreement says, "Not later"?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; except as to the final vote.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Ought not that to be made "not later," too? Ten days is a good while.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was thought that a definite date ought to be fixed for voting on the final passage of the bill, so that Senators might know when it was to be. Of course, when debate is finished we can take up any other business of the Senate and go on with it; but the time between the finishing of the income tax and the final vote is only the time between Saturday and Monday.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would not object to the unanimous-consent agreement on that account; but it is 11 days off, and it seems to me that to fix a definite day for a vote that far ahead might delay the passage of the bill and the consideration of other legislation. I think that with a date that far off it would be better to say that "not later than" that date the Senate shall vote; but, of course, I would not object to the unanimous-consent agreement on that account.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill. If debate upon the bill should be finished, there would be no objection to laying it aside and considering other matters, would there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely none.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If that course is pursued, the objection made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would be obviated.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that if we have a definite time fixed for voting upon amendments, often amendments will be presented when there will be no debate whatever. It seems to me a much better way would be, without fixing the time to vote, to say that after a certain time only 10 minutes' debate to each Senator will be allowed. We have had such a rule adopted in various instances, and a very lively discussion has occurred. It seems to me that that would be better, but I will state to the Senator from North Carolina that I will not make any objection on that account, as I have been very anxious to get a vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator will not make an objection, because it is with very great difficulty that we have been able to frame the agreement in a form that is expected to meet with the approval of all the Senators.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not expect to make any objection.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I could not hear what was said by the chairman of the committee. Do I understand that we can not vote on this bill until the 10th day of September?

Mr. SIMMONS. The 8th. I will state to the Senator, Mr. President, that we take from now until Wednesday of next week for discussion of the war excess profits tax section. If we get through with it before then, we can vote. Just as soon as we get through with the war-profits section, we proceed immediately to the consideration of the income-tax title of the bill; and if we can get through with that before Friday, we can take up the bill generally.

Mr. KELLOGG. But we can not vote on the bill generally until the following Monday?

Mr. SIMMONS. The following Monday we vote on the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Why not fix the date so that we can vote on the bill next week?

Mr. SIMMONS. We have fixed Saturday, but Senators objected to fixing a date before that time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I object to taking two weeks to consider a bill that has already been considered for three or four weeks.

Mr. HARDING and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have been looking at the language of the agreement, and it is very manifest that under this agreement these votes can not be taken until the days specified.

Now, I assume that the Senate, having gone this far in the consideration of this measure, is willing to give attendance and move along to a final decision on this bill. If that be so, I can not see what objection there could be to modifying the language of the agreement so that if the debate is exhausted we can vote at a time prior to the limit fixed in the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can.

Mr. HARDING. Not under the language of the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can vote on the different sections, but not on the general bill.

Mr. HARDING. Let us have it all so. Why not have it so that when the debate is exhausted this body can come to a decision?

Mr. NORRIS. Why not put in "not later than Monday," the same as in the other case?

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; I will consent to that change—not later than Monday, the 8th of September.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I hope Senators who are anxious to make this agreement will note the language. It is a very simple thing to change, and it will not press anybody in this body beyond his wishes. Suppose you make the agreement read that not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on a day not later than the calendar day of Wednesday, September 5, you will proceed to do so-and-so, and again not later than 4 o'clock p. m. on a day not later than Friday, September 7, and follow that language to the end? Then the matter will be open to a settlement whenever the Senate has exhausted its debate and is ready to reach a vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. LODGE. I did not know the Senator from Minnesota had the floor. I will take it in my own time.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I was only going to say that the objection to that is one that we have had a thousand times. If we put it in that way Senators will not be able to know when the vote is going to be taken, and I think on important votes of this kind Senators have a right to know when the vote is to be taken.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, that is very convenient for Senators who live down East here and want to go away and take their vacations. They will start off as soon as the day is fixed; but for Senators who have to stay right here every day, it will not be so convenient.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if that is addressed to me, I will state that I have been in attendance on the Senate since last December, with the exception of one week, and I have been here the whole of this summer, with the exception of one week.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I recognize the force of what the Senator from Massachusetts says about a Senator's right to know when the vote is going to be taken; but I have a pretty strong conviction that it is a Senator's duty to be here and be ready to vote at a time like this. I have not been away. I have been here all along.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to suggest that the Senator from North Carolina put in "not later than Monday," instead of fixing it definitely at Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to do that unless it produces some objection from some other source.

Mr. NORRIS. If somebody objects on that account I will not suggest it, of course.

Mr. LODGE. Not later than Monday at 5 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Unless there is some objection, I am willing to make that change.

Mr. LODGE. Five o'clock is fixed for the final vote?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. But it would do no good to make the change if it is going to bring forth another objection.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, there is a matter to which I have asked the chairman's attention.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hear no objection, Mr. President, and I will make that change.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment suggested by the chairman of the committee.

The SECRETARY. Before the words "4 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day of Monday, September 10" it is proposed to insert the words "not later than," so that it will read "and that at not later than 4 o'clock p. m."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That should be "not later than Monday."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if there is any reason why this date should not be fixed on Saturday preceding the 10th? We usually fix it at the close of the week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to have that language restated.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, before the reading occurs in the completed form I should like to ask that this "not later than" the day prescribed shall be written into each clause of the agreement.

Mr. SIMMONS. There is no objection to that, Mr. President—none in the world. I think that just clarifies it and makes clear what to my mind is meant.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, as the language is written in the agreement it is very ambiguous.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary make the changes the Senator from Ohio requests.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand, after a conference with him, that the Senator from North Carolina will take a vote on Saturday if he can get it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will make the changes suggested by the chairman of the committee. Do Senators desire the proposed agreement reread?

SEVERAL SENATORS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the proposed agreement?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to have the language stated.

The SECRETARY. "And that at not later than Monday, the calendar day of September 10, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate," and so forth.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I want similar language put into the other clauses of the agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. It is in there now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARDING. I should like to have them read. Probably I am a little more dense than some of the Senators.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I should like, on behalf of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] on one side and myself on the other, merely to announce to the distinguished Senators that that does not mean that they have permission to be absent in the meantime. They may be called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, can we have it read now? I should like to hear it as it has been perfected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas asks that the agreement be again read.

Mr. THOMPSON. However, I will withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement entered into is as follows:
Unanimous-consent agreement.

It is agreed, by unanimous consent, that the motion for cloture be withdrawn, and that at not later than the calendar day of Wednesday, September 5, 1917, at 5 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending and any amendment that may be offered and undisposed of to Title II, War-profits tax; that immediately thereafter the Senate will proceed to the consideration of Title I, War-income tax, and that at not later than the calendar day of Friday, September 7, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, and any amendment that may be offered and undisposed of to the said title; and that at not later than the calendar day of Monday, September 10, 1917, at 4 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to say, in connection with this unanimous-consent agreement, that I shall each day ask for a recess instead of an adjournment, to save the morning hour; and if as many as three Senators on any day, in order to get more time to debate, desire it, I will ask for a night session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m., Thursday, August 30, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, August 31, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 30, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God Almighty, ever present in the hearts of men, swayed by Thy holy influence and upheld by the power of Thy majesty, help us to go forward to the issues of the hour with perfect faith and confidence that all will be well; for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, August 28, 1917, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. AUSTIN, for one week, on account of illness.

To Mr. LEE of Georgia, for one week, on account of important business.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE PARADE (H. DOC. NO. 353).

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House an invitation, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Citizens' committee, selective-service parade, in honor of Washington contingent National Army, Tuesday, Sept. 4, 1917, 4 p. m., committee office, fifth floor, Star Building.]

AUGUST 29, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: The citizens' committee in charge of the honor parade for the Washington contingent of the National Army to be held Tuesday afternoon next at 4 o'clock begs to extend to you and through you to the Members of the House of Representatives an invitation to honor the paraders by participating therein, as President Wilson has notified the committee of his intention to march in and review the parade on that day.

The committee would highly appreciate an acceptance of this invitation and a notification of the number of Representatives who will be in line, so that appropriate arrangements can be made for their place in the parade.

As the Nation's representatives and as this parade is to take place in the National Capital it is the earnest hope of the committee that as many Members as possible of the House will take part in the parade in order that it may be a national demonstration of this most momentous event in the history of the country.

Awaiting your kind reply, I have the honor to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. GUDE, Chairman.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House accept the invitation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the House accept the invitation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—BEAKES AGAINST BACON.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on Elections No. 3, having under consideration the contested-election case of Beakes against Bacon, from the second Michigan district, I ask unanimous consent that the stenographic report of the hearings before that committee be printed; 500 copies, 50 of those for the use of the committee and the rest for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 3, asks that the hearings before that committee in the Michigan case be printed; 500 copies, 50 for the committee and the rest for the House. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Virginia whether any provision is going to be made for the printing of the briefs of counsel, so that the Members of the House may have the briefs as well as the copies of the hearings?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. They have all been printed, I understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are they at the disposal of the Members of the House?

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I think so.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Have not the various committees on elections of the House the privilege to print?

The SPEAKER. The rule runs that they print and bind all such documents as seem to them necessary, but I do not think that would extend to the printing of a thousand or five hundred copies of a great document like that would be.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I will amend my request and ask that a thousand copies be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks that 1,000 copies be printed of the hearings on the Michigan election case, and also the briefs.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I think the briefs have been printed, and I think a sufficient number are available for the use of the House. That leaves the hearings.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be assurance by the members of the committee that the briefs of the contestant and contestee would be available for the use of Members of the House who wish to use them.

Mr. WATSON of Virginia. I will say to the Member from Wisconsin that a large number of the briefs have been printed, and I have been enabled so far to supply the demand.

The SPEAKER. One hundred copies of the hearings for the committee and nine hundred for the House. Is there objection? There was no objection.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the reading of the Journal to-morrow and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table it shall be in order to consider the bill H. R. 5723, known as the soldiers' insurance bill.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. To-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the importance of this bill is so great that Members of the House ought to have the opportunity to study everything in connection with it. No Member of the House has had an opportunity to see the bill except the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. KITCHIN. The bill is printed, I wish to say to the gentleman, and the report, and unanimous consent will be asked and granted, no doubt, to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] to file a minority report.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to file a minority report, and I do not think it can be done by to-morrow morning. I wanted to have this week to do it. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] assured me the bill would not be brought up until next week.

Mr. ADAMSON. I intended to ask unanimous consent that any member of the minority may have until the conclusion of the general debate on the bill in which to file minority views.

Mr. MADDEN. What is the prospect as to the time for general debate?

Mr. ADAMSON. We ought to have at least one day for general debate, I think.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that this may involve so much and that it leads to such important conclusions, and there are so many fundamental principles involved in it that may affect the future—the question of whether this will preclude the possibility of pensions in the future, and how much it will cost now, and all that—it seems to me we ought to be given an opportunity at least to read the bill before we take it up.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that immediately upon the introduction of this bill it was printed and made available to all Members. Then we began to have hearings, and each day's hearing was printed, and a copy supplied to every Member of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, if the Speaker please, that the only copy of any hearing which I received was the first day's hearing, consisting of about 20 pages. I do not know anything at all about the bill, and I am going to object to unanimous consent being granted.

Mr. ADAMSON. Let me finish my statement. I was going to state that we had full hearings, and that every day, as the hearings were printed, we had placed in the box of each Member at the post office a copy of that day's hearing. If Members have not received them, it is not the fault of the committee, and we are trying still to supply copies of the hearings to all who desire them. In reporting the bill very few amendments have been made, and of course the bill is printed as amended. That has already been done.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman will yield for a question, did the chairman of the committee send copies of the hearings to Members who made no application for them, or did he wait for Members to apply?

Mr. ADAMSON. They were put in the box of every Member of the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Only one copy of a hearing, that of the first day, ever came to me.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know what happened to the others. Somebody else must have gotten them.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate, and I am sure the chairman of the committee [Mr. ADAMSON] appreciates, the force of the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], and I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider the bill on Saturday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table.

Mr. LITTLE. Reserving the right to object, when will the bill be printed?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is printed now, so Members will have practically all day to-day and to-morrow to read the report and the hearings on the bill. Saturday will be consumed in general debate, so that we can not vote on the bill until next week.

Mr. MADDEN. Are we going to meet to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will state to the gentleman—

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman mean that to-day and to-morrow there will be no further business transacted by the House, so that we will have time to consider the report and hearings on the insurance bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless by unanimous consent some other matters shall come up to-day. If I get unanimous consent to take up the bill on Saturday, I will ask to adjourn over until Saturday, so that we will have the full day to-morrow for Members to read the bill and the report and hearings.

Mr. GILLETT. May I ask the gentleman in the same connection—I think the House will be interested to know—what is the purpose with reference to the bond bill, so that we can plan our work accordingly?

Mr. KITCHIN. As I stated to the House the other day, I hoped to report the bond bill to-day and take it up to-morrow or Saturday; but we will not be able to report the bond bill until to-morrow or Saturday, and will be unable to take it up for consideration before Tuesday, anyway.

Mr. GILLETT. Do you expect to displace the insurance bill by the bond bill when the bond bill is ready?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we should do that. I think the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] would consent to that, because it is necessary to get the bond bill through at the earliest moment possible, in order to get out the advertisements and the plans for putting the bonds on the market, so that the public will know what they are. I understand that the other body will hold up other legislation for the purpose of passing the bond bill when it reaches them.

Mr. GILLETT. So that the gentleman's program would really be to take up the insurance bill on Saturday, have some general debate on Saturday, and then on Tuesday take up the bond bill and resume the consideration of the insurance bill later?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Personally I see no objection to that.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I desire to represent to the gentleman that the insurance bill is so important that it would be a thing very much to be deprecated to take it up on Saturday, when everybody understood that they could be away, and nobody knew anything about it. I think it ought to be taken up after the bond bill is disposed of, in the latter part of the week, and then when we get it up stick to it until we put it through.

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope the gentleman will not make any objection, because we will consume Saturday in general debate.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. But Members will not be here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To reserve the right to object. Is it the thought of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that there will be a vote on the insurance bill on Saturday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. My thought is that there will be nothing done on Saturday with respect to that bill except general debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that Saturday is usually an off day, that Monday will be a holiday, and that he himself has just asked that the House accept the invitation to see the parade on Tuesday.

Mr. KITCHIN. That does not take place until 4 o'clock, and I shall ask that the House adjourn in time for that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well. The bond bill, to which reference has been made, is the greatest bill in the history of the world. There has been nothing like it before in any legislative body in all history, and I want to know whether the gentleman expects to take up that bill on a holiday or in the midst of a parade, and have this House in the absence of printed information act upon it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that I do not expect to take it up during a parade; but it is my thought, and I think that was the understanding of our committee, that we would take it up Tuesday and have three or four hours of general debate here that day, and that if we did not finish the general debate it would go over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I remind the gentleman that no public hearings have been had by the Ways and Means Committee on this great bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that no public hearings have ever been given on a bond bill. I do not recollect of any. We did have the Secretary of the Treasury before us for two days and, as the gentleman knows, the reason that we are delaying now the consideration of the bond bill is because the Secretary of the Treasury will not have time to complete his statement in regard to the explanation of the bill until Friday night.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina concedes that Members of this House, even if the public does not get the information, are entitled to have laid before them in printed form the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. It will be printed Friday night and the Members of the House will have it on Saturday so that they will have Saturday, Sunday, and Monday to consider it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then it is the intention of the gentleman not to call the bill up earlier than Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Not earlier than Tuesday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman press for a vote on the bond bill on Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will it be safe to say that the discussion of the bill will occupy the whole of Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. General debate; yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But there will be no vote on Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. No vote on Tuesday.

Mr. MADDEN. Will printed copies of the bill and hearings be available for Members of the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. That is what we are waiting for. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a short statement to the House about the necessity of getting early action on this bill for compensation to the soldiers and for family allowances. The new draft will order to camp on the 5th of September 687,000 soldiers, and the sooner this bill is passed the sooner the families of these boys can be compensated in part for the loss of earnings and family support. We will take by force of arms, as it were, men who are now drawing salaries of, in some instances, $150 or $250 a month.

The men are taken away from their families and put into these training camps, and without this law $30 a month is all that they, as privates, can possibly get. The insurance feature of the bill is altogether voluntary and lies altogether with the soldier whether he takes it or not. That is by no means so important as is the rest of the bill, allowing compensation and family allowance.

Now, this bill was introduced and printed on the 10th day of August, and copies have been available ever since. I do hope that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] will not object to taking the bill up, at least on Saturday, and having general debate, on the idea that there will not be a full attendance. I have never known when we had general debate in the House on any day in the week, after the first speech explaining the bill is completed, that a full attendance remained in the House. Usually during general debate the House is practically empty of Members.

Mr. GILLET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GILLET. Has the committee reported any amendments to the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but the amendments are very simple and easily understood.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the bill being considered on Saturday. I will consent that the bill may be considered after the bond bill is out of the way.

The SPEAKER. The matter is not debatable, and the gentleman from New Jersey objects.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 78), which has come over from the Senate, to suspend for this year the work to be done on mining claims. It is well recognized throughout the West that labor is scarce, and to make people do the $100 worth of work this year will be a great hardship. I have had numerous inquiries throughout the West in regard to it and asking that the joint resolution be passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 78.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, this is the bill where the Secretary of the Interior reversed himself in the course of a few weeks whether it should be adopted or not?

Mr. FOSTER. Let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the reason for that was that he was reporting on another Senate joint resolution and not upon the resolution we have amended.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the full report, and Secretary Lane reversed himself without giving any adequate reason. I am constrained to object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 78. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am constrained to object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 5723, known as the soldier's insurance bill, be in order for consideration immediately after the passage by the House of the bond bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to couple with that the permission for minority views to be filed up to that time.

Mr. CANNON. We want the minority views filed before that time. There are not 20 Members in the House that understand the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that immediately after the passage of the bond bill by the House the soldiers' insurance bill shall be in order. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, that means that there will be no business until Tuesday next.

Mr. KITCHIN. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why will not the gentleman consent to an adjournment until Wednesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. We could not do that under the law. It is necessary that we meet on Saturday.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, let me say that I think it is pretty near time Congress got down to doing business so that we could get away home. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Some gentlemen have been here paying strict attention to business all through the hot weather, while others—

Mr. FORDNEY. I have done that. I have been here whenever I was needed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman came back the other day, but some have been here on the job all through the hot weather, and such Members ought to have a chance to look into these important matters further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the bond bill that this soldiers' insurance bill be taken up. Is there objection?

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] if embodied in his statement is the understanding that the bond bill will not come up until Tuesday next?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will not take it up until Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa arise?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To reserve the right to object and to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] what is the necessity of putting this matter over until after the bond bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because we can not get it up without bringing in a rule, and I think there is something in the objections gentlemen make that on such an important bill Members ought to have an opportunity to read the hearings and report, the minority report not having been filed yet, because there are so many holidays intervening between now and Tuesday. There comes Sunday, of course, and then we shall adjourn over Labor Day, because Members will be away and they will not have the opportunity to read the hearings.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It could be gotten up without a rule by adjourning over until to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we have to get unanimous consent then.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Now, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks unanimous consent that the minority of his committee shall have the privilege of filing their minority views not later than Saturday night—

Mr. ADAMSON. For three days.

The SPEAKER. Three legislative days?

Mr. ADAMSON. Three calendar days.

The SPEAKER. For three calendar days. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a minute to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, first I desire to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Saturday. Is there objection?

Mr. ADAMSON. If the gentleman from North Carolina will wait a minute until I get my request in he may decide to do what I want to do to-morrow.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will withhold the request.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Georgia did not make any request.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have a unanimous-consent request and secured two minutes in which to state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. I withhold my request.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that the State health authorities have offered their services to the Government during the war in the shortage of surgeons in the Public Health Service. Senate joint resolution 63 has been here some time and was reported to-day and put in the basket and will be printed to-morrow. The purpose of it is simply to call into service the eminent physicians of the various State health authorities when they are needed and to pay them only when they are needed. From every State in the Union there comes a demand for the consideration of such legislation, and I ask unanimous consent that we consider it when the House meets again, immediately after the reading of the Journal, whether to-morrow or Saturday.

The SPEAKER. What is the title of it, or what is the substance of it?

Mr. ADAMSON. It is to create a reserve corps of the Public Health Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, there will be ample time for its consideration when it is at the disposition of Members, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned to meet on Saturday, September 1, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the chairman of the United States Shipping Board submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Shipping Board for the service of the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 351); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Department of State for the service of the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 352); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. RAYBURN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 130), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COADY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the resolution (S. J. Res. 63) to establish a reserve of the Public Health Service, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 131), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 31, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS. I rose to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	La Follette	Sheppard
Bankhead	Hitchcock	McCumber	Sherman
Brady	Hollis	McNary	Simmons
Brandeggee	Husting	Martin	Smoot
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	New	Sutherland
Culberson	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Swanson
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Trammell
Fernald	Kenyon	Page	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	Kling	Penrose	Wadsworth
Hale	Kirby	Ransdell	Weeks
Harding	Knox	Saulsbury	Williams

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is absent owing to illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. My colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GERRY, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KELLOGG, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. SMITH of Michigan answered to their names when called.

Mr. COLE, Mr. CALDER, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. SHIELDS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on important public business.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] because of death in the family of the junior Senator from Montana.

Mr. JAMES, Mr. VARDAMAN, Mr. WATSON, Mr. POINDEXTER, Mr. THOMPSON, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE PARADE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication directed to the Vice President, which, without objection, he will ask the Secretary to read, as it is a matter which is to be brought before the Senate.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Citizens' committee. Selective-service parade in honor of Washington contingent, National Army, Tuesday, Sept. 4, 1917, 4 p. m. Committee office, fifth floor, Star Building.]

AUGUST 29, 1917.

HON. THOMAS R. MARSHALL, Vice President.

President of the United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The citizens' committee in charge of the honor parade for the Washington contingent of the National Army to be held Tuesday afternoon next at 4 o'clock begs to extend to you, and through you to the Members of the Senate, an invitation to honor the paraders by participating therein, as President Wilson has notified the committee of his intention to march in and review the parade on that day.

The committee would highly appreciate an acceptance of this invitation and a notification of the number of Senators who will be in line, so that appropriate arrangements can be made for their place in the parade.

As the Nation's representatives, and as this parade is to take place in the National Capital, it is the earnest hope of the committee that as many Members as possible of the Senate will take part in the parade in order that it may be a national demonstration of this most momentous event in the history of the country.

Awaiting your kind reply, I have the honor to remain,

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. GUDE, Chairman.

CHAS. J. COLUMBUS, Secretary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the invitation just read be accepted by the Senate and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon moves that the invitation just read be accepted by the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the invitation is unanimously accepted and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRADING WITH THE ENEMY.

Mr. RANDELL. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to which was recommitted the bill (H. R. 4960) to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 113) thereon. The bill was recommitted yesterday and the committee propose certain amendments to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not objecting to this report, I wish to ask whether it is really in order under the unanimous-consent agreement to present reports from committees and matters of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would suppose that that might be done by unanimous consent as a part of the ordinary preliminary proceedings at the beginning of a session. Does the Senator desire to object?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not going to object to it, but I do think that hereafter possibly all routine matters ought to be kept out under the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not consider that the unanimous-consent agreement prevents anything else from being considered by unanimous consent. That is as he understands a hasty reading of the agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. So that we may understand what the ruling of the Chair is, do I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that the unfinished business must be kept continuously before the Senate until a final vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Chair did not so rule.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then naturally any other matter could come up by action of the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is unwilling to make a hasty ruling, but he will decide when the matter comes up, if it is disputed.

BILLS AND A JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 2833) granting a pension to Enoch E. Willard (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2834) granting an increase of pension to Esli A. Bowen (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2835) granting an increase of pension to Clara A. Perry Estes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 2836) for the relief of Clara Elizabeth Huntington Hatzfeldt; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. GORE:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 97) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States requiring a popular vote before a declaration of war, except in certain instances, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I do not care to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HARDING obtained the floor.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. HOLLIS. Before the Senator from Ohio proceeds, I would like to make an inquiry as to the parliamentary situation. It is not altogether clear. The matter before the Senate now is Title II of the House bill. The committee has offered a substitute for Title II which is a motion to strike out and insert. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has offered what is in form a substitute, but he did not clearly state whether it is a substitute for the committee amendment or for the House text.

I invite the attention of the Senator from Alabama. He offers a substitute for Title II which is in form a motion to strike out the House provision and insert. Does the Senator offer it as a substitute for the committee amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then if the Bankhead substitute is voted down the question will recur on the committee substitute, which will then be open to further amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have another amendment pending that I am going to call up when this one is disposed of.

Mr. HOLLIS. When the pending amendment is disposed of the Senator will offer a further amendment to the committee amendment, and then other amendments, of course, will be in order. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the problem of raising revenues for war is to be solved neither in passion nor sympathy nor sentiment. It is a matter of cold, deliberate business. More, it is not a process for the solution of the world-old problem of wealth and poverty or the distribution of wealth, or the modern acute conflict between capital and labor.

The needless taxation of the fortunate has never once alleviated the condition of the unfortunate since the world began.

Capital and wealth, though not synonymous terms by any means, must bear the heavier taxation burdens of government and that government's defense, but it is neither possible nor desirable to have wealth and capital bear it all.

Mr. President, I do not question motives; I do not challenge any man's sincerity; but I do question the propriety of the preaching, in this critical time, that this is a war of wealth or that the pending measure is designed to relieve it from taxation and shoulder the burdens upon the so-called masses of the land.

This Nation is at war—drawn into the mightiest conflict of all the history of the world. We are to battle with the enemy on foreign soil, less distantly removed than most of us have realized, and we are beset by enemies at home. If this Nation ever needed concord of citizenship, we need it now. If we ever needed to harmonize the American spirit and move in that unison which befits the ideal Republic, we need it now. We need not only a reconsecration of patriotism to win the war, but we need it for the great aftermath, because we shall be as much tested then in making democracy safe for America as we are now in making the world safe for the compacts of civilization. We need the offering of men and means on the altars of devotion to-day, and we will need them even more in the restorations of peace on the morrow.

Mr. President, I rejoice that we have witnessed the heartening tender, the enspiriting offering of lives, which is the sublimest men can make, and the generous offer of means, for the main part wrought in worthy endeavor and treasured accordingly, but worthless, indeed, if our national cause fails.

To my mind the volunteer service in the hour of national anxiety has been the most inspiring manifestation of the American spirit, and the answer to the universal service call, in spite of claimed exemptions because of our absorptions in the pursuit of peace, is reassuring proof that popular government can defend itself. In this connection—I mean to say this because it ought to be said—capital has made the offer of its sacrifices befitting its acquirement under American opportunity, open to all men. It is not to be compared to the human sacrifices, because life offers all, but the tender of plants, resources, or output which came to the Government unheralded and without praise when this Congress cast the die of war is worth remembering as proof that the selfishness of a few can not and does not indict the productive heart of America. It is fair to challenge the charge that capital plays the rôle of slacker and it is a patriotic duty to resent the charge that this is a capitalistic war.

It is not necessary here and now to discuss the responsibility for the war into which we are drawn. But it will dispose of the charge of any American intent, capitalistic or otherwise, to say that we sought to hold aloof, and we did hold aloof, until innocent lives were sacrificed, lawful shipping destroyed, and national honor stung to unavoidable defense. We should be infinitely better off to-day if we had shown an earlier resentment. But it is useless to talk of that now. We should have had less staggering war burdens if we had correctly construed the signs of world ferment and began our preparation for defense in 1915; but it is useless to recall that lamentable failure now. We are involved and we must triumph. In the enormity of burden that comes of our measureless preparation lies the less duration of the war and the minimum cost of life, and it is this material burden which we can best afford to pay.

But I started to say, Mr. President, that American capital, including that of the farmer, was profiting far more out of the European war before our involvement than it can hope to do since our declaration, and every American citizen of discerning intelligence ought to so understand. Europe gave him his high-priced market then, while our own participation now has brought, in one way or another, modified prices to both ourselves and our allies, an embargo on the export to neutral markets, and a shortage of labor because of our resort to armed forces. Notwithstanding all this has added to cost of production, we are legislating to lower productive prices.

In passing at this point, Senators, I want to emphasize the fact, so much dilated upon by speakers on this floor, about the extraordinary cost of living and the misfortunes faced by the great American masses. Why, Senators, conditions in the United States of America are unspeakably more acceptable than they are in most of the nations of the earth to-day. I had a letter only yesterday from an authoritative source in Copenhagen saying that coal in neutral Denmark was almost impossible to secure at $100 per ton. If any of you have been in Copenhagen you know that the winter climate there is much more threatening than in the city of Washington. Conditions comparable to that are the result of no capitalistic connivance in the United States of America.

Let us note some inconsistencies, unavoidable, perhaps, that have a bearing on the situation. The agricultural world was brought into the enjoyment of unusual profits on production and was most naturally and commendably partial to peace. It little thought and little cared, seemingly, what limitations Germany placed on our shipping. It was little reckoned that shipping was the open way to the higher compensation. But after Congress declared war to maintain our lawful rights on the seas, and ultimately the embargo was placed on foodstuffs, instantly there was a demand for a Government fiat on wheat because we had, by embargo, taken away the world market for our grain. As a matter of fact, we were only controlling the sale.

Labor would have come to a like outcry if we had surrendered to the German prohibition of shipping, because a humiliating submission to the German prohibition, proclaimed in the submarine order, would have subjected us to the worse than half paralysis that prevailed in the first half of 1914, and we should have dwelt in stagnation and distress.

I sometimes think these things might well be recalled and they ought to be understood.

I know full well, sirs, that this is not a popular war. There are a score of contributing reasons. We are sincerely devoted to peace. We had no military establishment. Peace had been the campaign cry of the year before our involvement, and was dwelt upon in studied oratory on every stump—not on one side alone, let it be said. The war is seemingly 3,000 miles away from our nearest shore, though it might be brought very close to our shores were it not for the vigilance of the navies of the entente powers. We are a polyglot people, without racial entity, with the sympathies, hatreds, and prejudices of the European born who have found haven and opportunity here. The sympathies that were developed while Europe fought its frightful battles for two and a half years were not to be dissipated by our mere declaration of war. Our free Republic is full of aliens, uncommitted to the land of their nativity and undevoted to the land of their adoption. We have many among us who cloak themselves in American habiliments, but their souls and genius and cunning are loyal to the land from which they came. We have harbored, and harbor now, the trained propagandist whose business is to spread sedition, who would not be tolerated in any other land and ought not know any freedom here. We have plotters and bomb throwers and wholesale murderers who add to the problems of production and defense. We have the anarchist whose creed is destruction, and the irresponsible who mistake our liberty for license and condemn all law. We have the greedy to offend us, and those who profiteer in every walk of life. We have the agitator who agitates for compensation, not necessarily cash, and we have a natural development in the political life of popular government where some men had rather drift with a manifest sentiment than rise to the duty of creating helpful sentiment.

I will not enumerate further, lest I add to the gloomy portrayal; yes, I will add that we have not been clear about our reasons for making war. I have sometimes thought it would be well to say less about world-wide democracy and let it ring clear that we mean to hold America safe for Americans; that we rejoice in popular government and mean to prove its capacity to defend itself; that we believe American citizens have the right to go on peaceful missions and American cargoes must sail in safety anywhere under the shining sun of civilization; and that when Germany ruthlessly and murderously challenged our rights there was no answer but war, and it can not end until Germany is brought to submission. These things do not mean that we are fighting to fix the international boundaries of Europe or that we are a factor in the territorial or commercial jealousies of Europe, though against a war-mad nation we must make common cause.

Fortunately there is a great undercurrent of thinking, sacrificing, determined Americanism, and the surface gulf stream does not reveal the irresistible current of our national life. Into the undercurrent we shall cast the latent might of the great Republic, and when our rights are again secure and American life is again made safe we shall resume our problems which concern our domestic life and honestly try to solve them.

This is no time for envy or jealousy at home. This is the hour for common cause, concord of spirit, and unity of endeavor. It is no time excessively to magnify war burdens. Funds must be provided and will be provided. Shocking as the cost is, it is infinitely less costly to make the allied war than to fight alone.

Mr. President, I know the popular thing. I know the common people as well as anybody, because I belong among them. There are more common people in Ohio than in any State in the Union save three, because we have more population than any State in the Union excepting New York, Pennsylvania, and Illinois. I hold my commission from these common people. Mr. President, and expect to answer to them for every vote I cast in this body. In passing, I delight to say that I hold my commission in spite of the fact that throughout the campaign in which I was elected I told people of Ohio—these same common people so much talked about—that if they wanted a Member of the Senate who would everlastingly be baiting the great productive institutions of this country not to send me, because I would not consent to serve in that capacity. That conviction, Mr. President, has come from some 30 years of active experience in life promoting the very institutions that so many now would "swat" for one reason or another.

I make bold to say in this presence that what is good for Ohio is good for the Union. We are both agricultural and industrial. The fortunes of the two are inseparable in the long run, no matter what temporary divergences may arise. Our farmers delight in fitting compensation as much as those of Kansas or Minnesota or Texas. Our workingmen rejoice in ample wages as much as do those of Massachusetts or Connecticut or Montana. They are hit as hard by the high cost of living, which, by the way, is not chargeable to our entry into the war or to any connivance of capital, but to the abnormal destruction and consumption and the decreased production that attends this awful world conflict. But every workman in Ohio who ponders the problem—and I charge you that they think very clearly on these matters—knows that high prices stimulate production in every line of endeavor, and that unbearable burdens are sure to halt activities.

I assume, Mr. President, that between extremists and conservatives I am ranked with the latter. But I want to state how radical I can be. If it proves necessary in order to finance this war to a triumphant ending, I would vote to conscript every dollar of income in this country in excess of $5,000 to a family. I want that made clear. I say I would vote for such a thing if the national safety and the necessity of our triumph should call for such a course. If it is proven the pending bill is insufficient to meet national needs, I would unhesitatingly add more burdens to incomes, war profits, or otherwise.

If you strike at excess profits you reduce the incomes which are available for taxation. If you strike at excesses and supernormals you are likely to hinder our industrial productiveness.

The term "excess" seems to invite attack, but let us reflect a moment. Only a relative few are directly connected with the war. Nobody sees a bloodstain on food, yet it is in enormous demand. A few munition shops are directly connected with the conflict, but the great bulk of excess profits are only indirectly associated with war's grim expenditure, and many of them not at all except as war has added supernormally to our activities.

There is no cause for penalizing. Were it not for munition plants which responded promptly to entente needs, were it not for big and highly organized American industries in varied lines, first answering the call of our allies and now ourselves as well, Germany might to-day be dominating the world.

Some of them—many of them—have made enormous profits and poured them into the stream of our activities. It gave us new industrial and commercial life and added profits have spread themselves in a thousand directions.

The cost attending—that is, the cost to our people—has been the added expense of living, but that was the necessary corollary. It could not be otherwise. I do not assume to say that the very notable advance in wage has been proportioned to the increased cost, but I do know that destructive taxation will not correct the differences.

I want Senators to note how unfair some tendencies are. It is proposed to attack our great enterprises from two sides by those who ought to be allied with them in righteous activities. On the one hand, we are legislating and administering to reduce their profits, for which I cast my vote; now we have the proposed tax assault to discourage the activities which are as useful as trained armies. We not only curb prices to ourselves but we have undertaken to do so for our allies, who are our debtors now. And we are succeeding. If these larger concerns did not submit—they have submitted with good grace in most instances—we have given authority to seize their plants and operate them under Government direction. I want it clear that I have been in full accord with this grant of governmental power. Up to date I have heard none threaten to quit their productive operations, while it is fair to say in contrast, on the other hand, that thousands of representatives of the great common people in various ranks have said, "We are not patriotic enough to respond unless you grant us a certain compensation." It is not practicable to commandeer the farms, and the agricultural voting strength forbids a drastic course like that which is applied to the manufacturing industry. That is the truth about it, however unpopular it may be to say it, and so we legislate a minimum price on wheat, double the normal rates, while we are seeking to put the maximum price on the product of American industrial institutions, and hold it much below the normal conditions of a very live war market. It is not unreasonable, I choose to say, to guarantee a minimum of $2 on wheat. I think it will prove a prudent stimulation to production which will be well worth the cost, but it does not reduce living cost. Men on this floor have said much, and said it appealingly—so appealingly that I myself should have been carried off my feet if I had not known to the contrary—about consumption taxes and burdens upon the masses. I charge them that the congressional guaranty of $2 wheat has added ten times to the cost of conducting the simple American home because of that measure, and yet I do not pretend to question the propriety of such a course.

Why does not somebody emphasize the fact that this bill proposes to take twelve hundred and fifty millions from excess and supernormal profits, and nine hundred millions from incomes, and only eight-six millions are contemplated for the great mass, rich and poor alike, to pay? I am eliminating from these figures taxes on communication and transportation and the consumption of alcoholic liquors, and confining my comparison to the distinctly consumers' tax. Assuming that it is paid by all alike—which is never the case, because the man more able to buy is almost invariably the larger consumer—it will be less than $1 per capita, and I do not hesitate to say that a land worth fighting for is worth paying that much tax for during the strain of war.

Mr. President, there is a very mistaken notion in the popular mind and in some senatorial minds about excess profits. It is regrettable that there are not more men in public life who are familiar with the problems of big activities. Because a concern has made a million in excess profits one must not conclude that it has that million in quick assets. I know some really prosperous concerns whose excess profits are large, though not directly connected with the war, whose managers are staying up nights figuring how to pay the taxes this measure proposes to levy. That million of excess profits may be very real and have a proper place on the balance sheet, but it may be tied up in enlarged plant, added machinery, or increased stocks of raw materials or extended credits. I know one concern that took an advantageous munitions contract early in 1916, bought an idle plant to execute the order and, after filling that one contract its war business stopped. It had earned a profit, but it was wholly tied up in that plant. There was no grief, but it afforded a poor asset to turn into the Federal Treasury to meet a tax obligation.

One other incident will be revealing. It was my fortune quite accidentally to learn a bit of the inside problems of one great concern which I should have picked out as the most fortunate of war manufacturers. It was enormously engaged, running at flood tide. I would have guessed that the management needed a special force to count its cash gains. My wholly unpremeditated inquiry developed the startling fact that it had builded so enormously and had borrowed so widely that it was on the very verge of a receivership. I wish the proprieties admitted more details, because they would be illuminating. My point is that all activities are not golden, and all profits are not in available cash, which is the first essential to a tax receipt.

I am not arguing, therefore, to avoid more tax on excess and supernormal profits because a class is to be favored thereby, but because the burdens which the committee has proposed in most instances are all that the business can bear and continue healthful, and for the further reason that what is not adequately burdened in the tax on excess profits is reached on the dividends distributed in the income tax, even in the tax on surplus not actually employed in the business. I am not seeking to spare the excess profits from needed burdens. I am opposing the proposed assault. I am advocating the needed regard for productive activities and distributing agencies which will spare the country from paralysis now and from unfitness or unpreparedness for the vitally important period which will follow the war.

Let us look at the matter soberly for a moment from the Government viewpoint. No one disputes the need of enormous bond issues. We have no allies to borrow from. We are the creditor Nation. We can only borrow from our own people. Conscript incomes and excess and supernormal profits, or even approximate the conscription of them, and we shall have no one to buy our bonds.

I have already said I would go to the very limit on incomes, if need be, but let us first develop the need. It is very important to remember that the taxes imposed by this bill are not available until June, 1918. Meanwhile there will be pressing need for funds, and bonds must be absorbed. Notice of conscription in this bill will destroy our borrowing capacity, and we shall have witnessed the spectacle of a presumably intelligent people with supposed business sense having killed the fabled goose that laid the fabled golden egg.

Mr. President, it has been pointed out that we are raising a larger war fund by taxation in the first year of our entry than Great Britain is raising after three years of conflict. The war is likely to end, and I believe will end, before the burdens we are now levying are turned into the National Treasury. We may well cooperate to strike a staggering blow against the enemy, but we need not combine to strike ourselves at the same time.

If one generation pays it, the cost will not be inequitably distributed. Moreover, much of our outlay is for actual assets, not the wastage of war. Much cost of preparation will not be wholly a vain expenditure, because it will have value for years to come. The enormous outlay for merchant vessels will be a golden asset in the American merchant marine. It will be an acquisition incident to war which 30 years of peace would not even encourage. These assets are for the business of all the people to-morrow. Why exact all the cost from the activity of to-day?

Senators, if any taxation less than actual paralysis would more equitably distribute the profits of American production and tend to bridge the great gap in our social-economic life, I would greatly urge it. But unnecessary taxation only halts and hampers the needed activity of capital, and appeals to envy rather than encourages acquirement by industry and thrift. It would be better to equalize by creation than to seek to level by destruction.

I believe some measure looking to the fairer division of the profits of production in this country is absolutely necessary to continued progress and abiding tranquillity. I wish I knew the solution. I only know taxation will not effect it.

I know that thrift, genius, pluck, talent, and industry make capital, and I know that idleness, improvidence, and incapacity halt millions of men to whom the way is invitingly open. Perhaps we should accomplish more by legally regulated habits of living and expenditure; but no one would dare to propose that amid the boasted freedom of democracy.

Some years ago, Mr. President, when visiting Venice, I noted that the gondolas in which we made our way about her canals were all painted black, with little or no ornamentation. It provoked my curiosity, because even the unimaginative could see the possibility of gay coloring and ornate decoration of those dreamy craft. Upon inquiry I learned that centuries ago the rivalry and attending extravagances in gondola decoration led to an official order that all must be painted black and without ornamentation, in order to halt a real menace to the fortunes of the Venetians, through the processes of extravagant expenditure; and that simple style very sensibly remains in practice to this day.

I know life is a very bitter struggle to the unfortunate and to the underpaid. It is even more bitter to the envious and the improvident. We need more knowing economists in everyday life, and less theorists on the soap boxes, and fewer advocates of legislative remedies, because first aid is to be found in the home. This does not argue against the American standard of living. It is the highest in the world, and I rejoice to boast it, because it proves we have outstripped all other peoples in attainment, however far we may be from the highest ideal. And we must go on; but I think it is good sometimes to stop to measure our progress.

Only a day or two ago, reading in the press of the eagerness of the Austro-Hungarian people for peace, I noted the statement that Hungary was feeling deeply the failure to receive $8,000,000 yearly which Hungarian workmen in the United States were in the habit of sending there out of their wage savings. There was no information as to how many Hungarians were on American pay rolls, and nothing as to their rate of wage. It is a fair guess that a goodly proportion is engaged in the less skilled employment, and therefore drawing the lower scale of wage. Born to a different standard, they toil and save, and have given to the needy in the land of their nativity a reflex of American opportunity, however little it may be valued here at home.

There is scarcely a Senator enrolled on this membership—I will not restrict it to my few hearers—who lives in an industrial center if he will step to the money-order department of his post office on a pay night in his community, who will not find scores and scores of the representatives of the lowly and the industrious from foreign lands turning their pay envelopes into money orders to send to the lands of their origin. I delight to think of it, because to me it is the most substantial proof in the world of the progress America has made in opening opportunity and extending encouraging compensation for activity and industry.

Mr. President, I have listened to the appealing speeches on this floor for the larger tax burden, and if my life had not put me in touch with business operations I should have been quite carried away. That is why I deplore the speeches, however sincere they may be, however lofty the motive which inspires them, because they create a wholly wrong impression. These advocates are eminent as lawyers and distinguished as statesmen. I wish they might sometimes get on the other side of the proposition and have a practical experience.

In passing, it will be interesting to make an allusion to a very particular friend of mine who had a number of very active and fruitful years on the Chautauqua platform. He was a great and forceful idealist. He preached a very sincere gospel of the uplift. He was ready to make war on all existing abuses and the great fortunes which oftentimes come of industrial endeavor, and through that process, sincere and earnest, he finally acquired sufficient capital to go into business for himself. That turn of his affairs, though he continued on the rostrum, put him on the other side of the counter in the counting room. I had had occasion to challenge some of his theories. After he had had two years of actual experience from the business man's point of view, from the standpoint of the employer, who has more to do with the weal or woe of a community than any professional man in it, he frankly confessed his change of mind.

Sometimes men arrogate to themselves very exceptional importance because of their professional acquirements. Even in the tax bill, not selfishly, I suspect, but out of deference to professional attainments, we exempt the supernormal profits of the professional man. I respect him very highly. I started to be one myself and found I was probably lacking in attainments, and returned to the dull and the sober problems of business. But with all deference to our professions, I want to say a great captain of industry who employs his armies of men under our modern system has more to do with the weal or woe of the community than all the professional men in it. Let us do him credit once in a while when we are considering the elements which make for American activity.

But I started to say that this friend of mine got on the other side of the counter. After he had had a couple of years of experience he said to me one day, "My friend, I have cause to change my viewpoint of things. I said a good many things on the Chautauqua platform that were not based on experience and they are not correct. I am a living example of a converted man, though I do not say much about it publicly."

The trouble about this arrayal of interests, about this very popular appeal to the common people, in whom many men have just as much interest without saying much about it as have those who make much profession, is that it creates an entirely wrong impression. This is no time for it; we can not afford the division; we must be one people. It is all wrong to create a wholly mistaken impression. These advocates are eminent as lawyers and distinguished as statesmen, but they have never wrestled with the business pay roll and the financial problem from the producing or distributing viewpoint.

Even without this knowledge public men ought to differentiate between capital and wealth, and ought to know that the great body of our enriching activities is not greedy. The selfishness involved is that human selfishness that is born in all of us, and is more or less manifest in all walks of life. Many a capitalist offends and not a little of wealth is hateful. That does not taint the whole any more than the pitifully poor in many cities stamp poverty as an index to American life. We can not eliminate the offender, nor the subject of charity. They have existed from long before the dawn of Christian civilization. Both are as old as human history and both will continue to the end of the world, no matter what devices men may legislate. Congress can not fix its gaze on either or both and write a revenue bill to meet the needs of a Republic at war.

Mr. President, these remarks, sober as they are, may seem little pertinent to the measure before us, but I have deliberately given them this trend because of the issue raised in this body, and not very many men seem willing to speak along these lines. I would have little of envy and jealousy and suspicion and hatred in peace, and we ought to have none of them in a war for preserved Americanism. When our enemies within our borders are preaching it, and the seditious are inciting it, I feel the obligation of uttering such truths as I believe make for concord and united endeavor. Every domestic controversy, every home conflict, every inharmoniousness of our normal pursuits should be put aside until the common enemy is vanquished, else we shall have no Republic whose problems are to be solved.

Let me hurriedly summarize the purport of these remarks. We must levy such war taxes as are necessary to finance a stupendous outlay to hasten our triumph in the war. We are starting out to levy in one year more than one-fifth of the war cost, which is far in excess of the tax imposed by any other nation at war. Now, note this: Of this enormous levy, twenty-one twenty-sixths are assessed against the capital and incomes of the land; only one twenty-sixth is levied as a consumer's tax, which burdens no one element of citizenship, but all alike in proportion to consumption, and the balance goes to alcoholic products, tobacco, and luxuries, which make the burden either imperceptible to feel or unnecessary to assume.

This policy puts the enormous burden on those who can afford to pay. It does not conscript. It does more than conscript, if you apply the term as it is related to the Army, because I do not hesitate to make the statement that under the pending bill you are taking a larger percentage of the profits of the land than you are the men of the land, infinitely so. It takes and distributes the great bulk of war profits for our common cause and still permits the activities so essential to good fortune, to make effective warfare and prepare for after reconstruction. It leaves something of the harvest of our needful and helpful activity to absorb the bonds that necessity and sound policy requires us to issue, and it leaves something, too, on which to depend if the requirements of war and war construction should double the need for funds by taxation. No one who thinks, unless he be an enemy, can wish this great people to bankrupt its taxing capacity at the very outset of our war activities. Let us have something in reserve. We must have a reserve, because the world recognizes to-day that our material strength will be a deciding factor in ending the great conflict.

Tell it to the hundred millions of America that not only is Congress not trying to shield capital and wealth, but it is assigning to them the burdens of war cost on the one hand and has written the authority to restrict prices and reduce profits on the other. That ought to be understood by the American people. And tell it to all these United States that there are Representatives in Congress who prefer to have our great productive activities go on, so that all the people may live and hold somewhere near the normal way, earning more and not less, to meet the war cost of existence in every home.

There are unavoidable burdens for all. No law can eliminate them. We would not be a popular Government, with boasted equality, if we could. And there are unavoidable sacrifices to be made, and I choose to say it and emphasize it, this Republic will be stronger for the making of these sacrifices. We have been taught to think only of the things the Government does or can do for us. The hour of test has come when we are to determine what we can do for our Government and the security of national life. We can not give alike in means, we can not give alike in personal service, but we can sacrifice alike, we can promote concord alike, we can put aside our differences of peace and stand for a people united in war and justify the faith that is in us and glorify the Republic in its example to the world.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the revenue bill which is now pending was, as I remember, reported to the Senate on the 6th day of this month, and on the 11th day of the month the debate was opened by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The estimated revenue to be derived under this proposed bill as first reported was $2,006,970,000; $777,700,000 of this tax was to be collected from incomes and $562,000,000 from war profits, and the balance, or $667,270,000, from a tax on consumption and on business.

I can sympathize with the committee, because I realize how difficult it is to write a tax bill that will be approved by everybody, that will meet the approval of not only the Members of this body but which will stand the test of criticism of the public. But the committee seems to have been exceedingly unfortunate, and I think unnecessarily caused a lot of dissatisfaction by undertaking to pass the bill not upon its merits but by the specious argument that it would be a popular measure. It was evident, to me at least, that the intention was to pass the bill in the same manner that much legislation has recently been passed, by using the strong arm of the majority rule. It is manifest, however, that we have all heard from home, and instead of appealing to prejudice we are now to be allowed to discuss the measure upon its merits.

The committee has totally abandoned the arguments which were used when the bill was first brought into the Senate. In fact it has reversed itself and is now commending provisions proposed by the minority which it condemned at the outset.

The history of this bill is but a fair illustration of the importance of allowing ample time for the discussion of any measure which vitally affects the interest of the American people. If the sponsors of this bill had been successful in forcing it through without full discussion and debate a gross injustice would have been committed against the rank and file of our people. It would have been the cause of losing a great deal of revenue to the Government which is absolutely necessary at this time in order to most effectively prosecute the war. But I do not wish to unduly criticize any members of the committee for bringing in an imperfect measure which no Member of this body would even attempt to defend at this time.

I think it is now generally conceded that the rates first proposed were unskillfully adjusted and that the amounts proposed to be raised were inadequate and above all that the bill as originally proposed was inequitable in its terms and unjust to the people. I am glad to say that due to the debate upon this floor and to criticisms of the bill by a small minority the committee has seen fit to materially change the provisions and that the revenue to be derived from war profits has been doubly increased by the committee.

I believe that it is a fallacious argument to say that we can make this war popular by collecting the revenue from the poor people and allowing big business to escape heavy taxation. I think it is very generally understood that a very large majority of the people are opposed to any proposition which will make it possible for the money slackers to escape a just and heavy tax on the profits and incomes they are making out of this war.

Taxation is both complex and vexatious, but it has unnecessarily been made so, because it seems to be the weakness of mankind to first protect their own individual interests and to make their fellow men carry as much of the burden as possible. The strong man has never been willing to share the burden of taxation according to his ability to do so, but has always made an effort to be relieved from the responsibility as far as has been expedient and possible. For this reason it has become necessary to set up an expensive system to enforce the collection of taxes according to certain governmental rules.

In the economic development of our country there has developed a complex system and variations in the method of levying taxes. There are, however, only two sources from which revenue may be derived. In the final analysis it narrows itself down to two classes—direct and indirect taxes.

Direct taxes are levied against people's estates or incomes directly; while indirect taxes are levied upon articles used by the people, and are primarily paid by the individual who pays in the first instance, but who usually passes on the charge to some one else until it reaches the ultimate consumer.

Indirect taxes bear upon the individual consumer, regardless of his financial standing or his ability to pay, while direct taxes are assessments against the people's property or income, or against a person who holds property, although he may not own it.

But while it is true that taxation is an intricate problem, it has been made more so than is necessary by the enactment of legislation and adoption of rules which are not only in themselves confusing but unjust and inequitable, and while I believe that all persons should pay a tax for the protection our Government bestows upon us, it should be done on a scientific and equitable basis. The heavy burden of taxation should fall upon those who, under the protection of our Government and its free institutions, have made profits and amassed great fortunes and can therefore stand a heavy tax.

I have always believed in a graduated income tax, and I still believe that if a just rule is laid down no better or fairer rule can be adopted, if it is based upon a principle of taxing people's property and income in accordance with their ability to pay. And it ought not to be difficult to adopt a system of taxation which would accomplish that very thing.

I think I realize that there is an inherent desire among the human family to possess property and wealth, and this desire seems to increase in proportion to the property and wealth owned. I think it is safe to assert that rarely, if ever, has a disposition been shown by the wealthy class to pay their proportion of the burden of taxation in accordance with the rule I have suggested. But while it is true that the men who own great property and wealth have always looked with disfavor upon any method which would take from them a portion of their wealth in accordance with their ability to pay the tax for the necessary expenses to conduct the affairs of government, it seems to me that in a crisis like this, when as has been so forcefully and so persistently stated, that our Government is in danger of being invaded by a foreign foe, that in such a deplorable time every loyal citizen, poor or rich, ought to be glad and willing to do his bit, and no man is justified in shirking this responsibility. If he does, he is a slacker, and ought to be dealt with in the same manner as the individual citizen who is asked to give his services, but refuses to heed the call to the colors to defend the flag.

These are not normal times, but a period of war, and the man in possession of wealth has no more right to withhold his profits, or even his wealth, to be used for the protection of this Government, than the individual citizen under the selective-draft law has the right to refuse to serve. In my judgment the men of wealth can not afford to have it said that they are unwilling to pay the cost of the war; and I can not believe that a majority of the men possessing great wealth are so blind to justice, and so unpatriotic, as to refuse to give up at least a large portion, if not all of their profits and income during the war, for the protection of the country and the Government which has dealt so generously with them, and which has in the past, and will in the future, continue to protect them, their property, and their business.

I am going to take the time of the Senate for a few minutes to analyze a portion of the personal income-tax statements for the years 1915 and 1916, taken from the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the two years named.

I want to first call attention to the number of returns in excess of $3,000 to $4,000 for these two years. In 1915 there were 82,754 persons making returns of a net income of more than $3,000 and not over $4,000. In 1916 there were only 69,045 persons making returns of incomes over $3,000 and not over $4,000, showing a decrease of 13,709. Now it might be said that one reason for that decrease is that a number of persons who earned more than $3,000 and not more than $4,000 in 1915 were put into the next bracket, which covers incomes from $4,000 to $5,000; but such argument could not be substantiated, because I find that in 1915 66,525 persons made returns of a net income between $4,000 and $5,000, whereas in 1916 only 58,949 reported and paid an income tax on an amount from $4,000 to $5,000. I find that the number of persons who made report and paid a tax on incomes from $5,000 to $10,000 for the two years named were 127,448 in 1915, and 120,402 in 1916, showing a falling off of the number of cases reported of 7,046. We go now to the next step—$10,000 to $15,000. I find that in 1915 34,141 persons reported, and in 1916 34,102, a decrease of 39 in the number of persons who reported and paid tax on an income of from $10,000 to $15,000.

I want to call attention to the fact that the number of people who have an income of less than $10,000, even a sufficient minimum income to bring them within the provisions of the income-tax law have been reduced during the two years by more than 22,000. I am also going to show the increase in the number of people who have made larger incomes and who have increased their profits tremendously, and I shall give the exact percentage, figured out from the statistical reports.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. GRONNA. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. PENROSE. How does the Senator explain the decrease in the smaller incomes? I would suppose that while the smaller incomes might swell into the higher grade there would be coming up from the ranks additional individuals with smaller incomes, keeping the number equal or even raising it higher.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Pennsylvania has the same opinion about that as I had until I had carefully figured it out. I thought, of course, that the decrease in the number of the people who received small incomes would naturally be added to those receiving higher incomes, but I find instead of doing that that they have been eliminated. The Senator has asked me a very pertinent question and I am glad that he asked it. To me, sir, it is a conclusive proof, which no Senator on this floor will undertake to deny, that the burden of the war already has fallen most heavily upon the poor people or upon people in moderate circumstances. There is not a Senator on this floor who will undertake to deny that. As I listened to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]—and I always listen to him with pleasure, for he is a man of very great ability—I could not help but take exception to some of the statements made by him when in his criticism he directed that criticism to only a certain class.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit another interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not think the Senator has fully answered the question, from my point of view at least. Certainly wages and incomes have been universally going up.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Then why should the class of modest incomes go down, as indicated by the number of individuals included in the category?

Mr. GRONNA. I can only give the Senator my own opinion as to that. My reason for it is that the cost of living has increased to the laboring man, and house rent has also increased.

Mr. PENROSE. But that does not diminish the income.

Mr. GRONNA. It certainly does diminish the income to a great many people who are not working on a fixed salary; it necessarily decreases it. I take it there are very few people in the United States who are working for wages and as day laborers who have ever paid any income tax. I take it it is only people who have a fixed salary, who are working either for the Government of the United States, or who are at the head of institutions of learning, and other professional men who have been able to pay such a tax. I will also include people of moderate means in small business institutions as being among the people who have made these reports and who have paid the income tax on small amounts. The net number, however, I repeat, of more than 22,000 have been impoverished so that they did not make reports in the year 1916 such as they made in 1915, because they did not receive incomes up to the amount of the minimum, and they were not compelled under the law to pay an income tax.

The next bracket shows that the number of persons reported as having paid taxes on incomes of $15,000 to $20,000—and I find that from now on the number paying on the higher incomes is steadily increasing, showing that the people possessing large wealth have been benefited by the increase in the profits since the war—in 1915 the number reported as having paid taxes on incomes from $15,000 to $20,000 was 15,790, while in 1916 the number had increased to 16,475.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $25,000 to $30,000 in 1915 was only 5,483, while in 1916 the number was 6,196.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $30,000 to $40,000 was 6,008 in 1915, but in 1916 the number had increased to 7,005.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $40,000 to $50,000 in 1915 was only 3,185, but in 1916 it was 4,100.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $50,000 to $75,000 in 1915 was 3,650 and in 1916 was 4,791.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $75,000 to $100,000 in 1915 was 1,501 and 2,056 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $100,000 to $150,000 in 1915 was 1,189 and 1,793 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $150,000 to $200,000 was 406 in 1915 and 724 in 1916. It will be noted, Mr. President, that in this instance the number of persons reported as having paid the income tax on incomes of the amount stated increased almost 100 per cent.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $200,000 to $250,000 in 1915 was 233 and 386 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $250,000 to $300,000 in 1915 was only 130 and 216 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $300,000 to $400,000 in 1915 was 147 and 254 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes from $400,000 to $500,000 in 1915 was only 69 and 122 in 1916.

The number of persons paying taxes on incomes of $500,000 and over in 1915 was 174 and 209 in 1916. I find that in 1916 120 persons reported having made incomes of more than $1,900,000.

Now, I wish to call attention to where these people reside. They do not seem to come from the agricultural sections of the country. I could not help but think of that as the distinguished Senator from Ohio referred to the profitable condition of the business of agriculture and how unjustly the prices on the products of those who are engaged in that industry had been increased; but I fail to find—and I have made all the investigation that it is possible for me to make—that any of the returns on the large incomes were made by men engaged in the farming industry.

Now, let us see where do the men reside who pay taxes on these tremendous incomes. I find that they are located in States where large manufacturing establishments are situated and in the cities where men possessing large fortunes have their domiciles. I find that 4 persons who received an income of $1,900,000 in 1916 reported from Connecticut; 4 from Delaware; 1 from Georgia; 4 from Illinois; 1 from Maryland; 2 from Massachusetts; 2 from Michigan; 1 from Minnesota—that is as far west as we can go to reach those large incomes—1 from Missouri; 2 from New Jersey; 74 from New York; 6 from Ohio; 1 from Oklahoma; 10 from Pennsylvania; 1 from Rhode Island; and 1 from Vermont. It appears that the plutocratic farmers who are receiving these very large incomes have failed to make their returns; at any rate, the farmer seems not to be specially mentioned or included in the list of those making returns as millionaires.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. GRONNA. I will be very glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that I am advised that most of the gentlemen to whom he refers, at least those coming from the city of New York, are large farmers and much of their profits, or some of them at any rate, are obtained from farming. I know many of them myself. They have farms, and they are making a profit from their farms. I doubt very much, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota, if they make $2,000,000 a year from their farms, but farming contributes undoubtedly to their profits.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am really sorry that the Senator has qualified his statement. I was going to ask him—and I will ask him now—if he can state from his own knowledge whether he knows of any farmer who has made a return showing an income of over a million dollars or five hundred thousand dollars or one hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. CALDER. I will say to the Senator that Mr. John D. Rockefeller is one of the largest farmers in our State, and, I understand, is engaged in successful farming all over the country.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator very much for that information. It is certainly very enlightening, and I know that the people of the country will appreciate the fact that the farmer John D. Rockefeller has been able even to make farming a profitable business.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, is there not a great difference between the agriculturist and the real farmer? The agriculturist has been defined as one who makes his money in town and spends it on the farm. He does not know very much of real farming. I am glad to know, however, that Mr. Rockefeller is one of our largest and most successful farmers.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator from Iowa has correctly pointed out the difference between the "agriculturist" and the "farmer." I think that the men who always make a profit in the industry of farming are the men who have other business or who have some profession that pays them well, so that whatever they lose on the farm they are able to apply to the farm loss and still make a handsome return. I think the Senator from Iowa is correct in assuming that that is the condition.

I am going to qualify the statement I intended to make, since the Senator from New York has informed me that there is at least one farmer in New York who is making returns upon an income tax, namely, John D. Rockefeller; so I will modify my statement and say that there is 1 farmer among the 74 in the State of New York who is reported as having an income of $2,000,000 a year and more. They seem to be located in New York City, however. Whether these 74 men are among the laboring class of New York I have not been able to ascertain.

I have received so much information from the Senator from New York regarding the farmers that I will venture to ask him a question. Can the Senator from New York inform the Senate whether, in his opinion, any of the laboring men living in the city of New York have incomes amounting to a million dollars, or $500,000, or $50,000, or $10,000?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, if the Senator desires me to answer his inquiry—

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I should like to have the Senator do so.

Mr. CALDER. Of course the Senator knows as well as I do that no laboring men—if he means men who work with their hands all day and all the year—have incomes of $50,000 a year. I will say to him, however, that many of the men returning incomes of the magnitude suggested by him were, in the beginning, laboring men. Many of them began their lives upon the farm. I will venture the statement, without knowing positively but fairly accurately, nevertheless, that 75 per cent of the men whose names are returned as earning incomes exceeding $1,900,000 and residing in the city of New York came from the farm and made their beginning there, and then established themselves beyond the limits of their farms in the great metropolis.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota permit an interruption?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. In connection with the statement of the Senator from New York, I want to add a very striking illustration. I say, without any exaggeration, that the greater part of the executive heads of the iron and steel industries in Pennsylvania literally rose from the ranks, from positions where they only earned a dollar and a half or less a day, and rose to the heads of these great concerns, and acquired whatever capital they may possess on account of their remarkable ability as executives and their knowledge of metallurgical processes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator might go a step further and say that practically all the heads of the great transportation systems of the country started away down the line in humble positions.

Mr. PENROSE. I think that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know that the president of the New York Central Railroad was a very humble employee of the railroad company when he first began, as were each of his predecessors. His immediate predecessor, I think, Mr. Newman, began his life as a brakeman on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad, where he took all the chances and the hazards of his occupation, and worked for a very small remuneration. I think the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania can be made with reference to the transportation companies without any question at all.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senators for the statements they have made. I agree with them that many of these men who are now designated as so-called captains of industry have in early life, in their boyhood days, lived on the farm. We can at least say this for the farm—that while it is not in itself a profitable business, it is a healthy business. It is one where men of brawn and brain can be reared, and that is to the credit of the industry—more so than if the industry itself furnished an opportunity for the people engaged in it to lay up and hoard great fortunes.

To me this report tells a significant as well as a sad story. It must be evident to all who will study this report that during this war a comparatively few men have been the beneficiaries of an increased income, and if we take the report of corporations we find practically the same situation. Can anyone question the sincerity of the common people of this country when they are praying for an honorable peace with this report and these figures staring us in the face? This report clearly indicates that as this war progressed 13,709 of our people who had an income and paid taxes on an amount between $3,000 and $4,000 had their incomes decreased or their living expenses increased so that in a single year their incomes were not subject to taxation at all, and a total number of 28,370 had had their incomes reduced from the year 1915 to 1916 so that they were paying no income taxes in 1916. But you will say that instead of paying taxes on a smaller income they are paying taxes on a larger income. That is true as to a much smaller number than the 28,000 which last year paid a smaller income tax, but the increase has affected only 6,315, so that 22,055 persons of our country have been impoverished or have had their incomes reduced below the minimum subject to taxation during the last year, and it has adversely affected persons of moderate or small incomes. In 1915, 174 persons received an income of over $500,000 to $1,000,000, but last year there were 329 whose income had been increased above one-half a million dollars, and there were 120 whose incomes were above $1,900,000, or in other words there has been an increase of 89 per cent plus of those who receive an income of a million or more in a single year.

The pending bill is one providing for the appropriation of money to carry on the war. Only a few months ago a law went into effect providing that the Government can demand the services of our young men between the ages of 21 and 31 years. That law has been in effect only a few months, and yet hundreds of thousands of our boys have been requested by our Government to comply with this law. They have, of course, done so. They have submitted to law and order. There was nothing else for them to do. There may have been a few instances where people have refused to register for reasons which I do not care to discuss now, but such cases are very rare.

The American boys have shown their patriotism by rallying to the colors. The parents of these young men feel that they have sustained a severe loss. To the mothers of these boys the ordeal has been severe and the loss almost unbearable. Thousands of mothers who only a few months ago were rejoicing because they saw a brilliant future for their sons are to-day in deep sorrow because they are mindful of the fact that death on the field of battle may be their lot. And these same young boys who only a short time ago were the real joy, expectation, and hope of their parents, are to-day the cause of making their hearts heavy, and in many instances broken.

But these young men have been conscripted. They have been asked to sacrifice their blood upon the altar of their country, and the boys have signified their willingness to do so. They have given up their all; they have shown obedience to their Government and to law.

But now, when we raise the question of how the expense for carrying on this war, and the question of providing these boys with means to carry it on, we are not so ready to conscript the wealth, not even the wealth which has been made due to the war. We are not proposing to touch the normal profits of the rich and of corporations. We are merely proposing to take a portion of the profits they are making due to the war. Shall we place our wealth and the profits, which amounts run into the billions of dollars annually—I say, shall we place that wealth above the lives of our young men? It would be no hardship to the rich or to the corporations if we should take all of this war profit. They would still have their normal profit, and their capital would be absolutely intact or unimpaired.

To me it seems unthinkable that any man who calls himself a citizen and a patriot should object to most willingly give up his entire profit; yea, if need be, his entire fortune. But it is evident that that disposition does not exist among these men who have so loudly proclaimed their patriotism, and who so vigorously urged that this war should go on. I do not care to go into detail as to the cost, or the probable cost, of this war. I know that it has already cost us billions of dollars; that it is costing us on the average of $25,000,000 a day now. I care not so much for that money, but my heart is touched when I think of the thousands of young men whose ambition and hope was for a bright and brilliant future, but who have been compelled by law to surrender everything; to forego the pleasure of a brilliant career such as was outlined by them. They have willingly gone to the front and are going to the front by the hundreds of thousands, expecting that their blood will be shed, that their lives will be sacrificed upon the field of battle, and yet we are quibbling about the rates of taxation upon the fortunes of those who are staying at home. I care not whether the war profits are small or large; we ought not to quibble about whether or not we should take these profits and use them to the best advantage for our soldiers, to make it possible for our Army to be as efficient as it can possibly be made.

I have listened to some of the arguments made upon this floor, and I believe that the disposition shown is not such as ought to exist in this body in a crisis of this kind. We should not let our criticism extend to the point of invidiousness and hatred. We are representing more than a hundred millions of people whose interests are involved; we are the representatives of the several States of this Union, and it is my belief that unless all the people, regardless of their station in life, and regardless of their financial standing, are equitably taken into consideration, we are not performing our full duty. We all realize that we have the rich and we have the poor among us. We all realize that some people have been more efficient, more ambitious than others. We all realize that in many instances some have been more fortunate than others, but now it becomes our solemn duty to do justice to all.

When any Senator on this floor rises in his seat and makes a deliberate charge against any Member of this body who believes he has the right to offer amendments providing for higher rates against wealth, with ulterior motives, he should be asked to substantiate and to prove such charges, and if unable to do so, the rules of the Senate should be invoked and a retraction should be asked. We have no right to misrepresent and to put in a false light any citizen, either inside or outside of the Chamber. I believe it is a good thing that we do not all have the same vision and see things alike. I have no objection to a just criticism, but I deplore the practice of attacking any citizen, in the Chamber or outside of the Chamber, unjustly. Misrepresentation is not criticism, but libel or slander, and no man has either a moral or a legal right to accuse his fellow man of ulterior motives unless he is in a position to prove the charges. Men are entitled to their opinions, and there does exist an honest difference of opinion, and we can not harmonize these differences unless we proceed with dignity and in a spirit of fairness.

Oh, this Senate can not afford to resolve itself into a mob and still maintain its respectability. The membership of this body represents a great constituency of a great country; it represents not only the richest and wealthiest Nation on the face of the globe but I believe the most intelligent and patriotic, and for that reason personally I have tried to bridle the greatest enemy which man has, and that is his own tongue.

I am reminded of the words of the Master in His Sermon on the Mount:

But I say unto you, whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca, shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.

And in the words of Solomon:

Put away from thee a froward mouth, and perverse lips put far from thee.

We have been told that if we increase the rates on incomes and on these war profits we may make this war unpopular. Does anyone believe that any war is pleasing to the people who have to wage it? Is it not safe to assume that those who go to war do so as a solemn and patriotic duty? It is my honest belief that the men who go to war for the sake of performing a patriotic duty are the ones who make the best soldiers upon the field of battle. Men who go there for popularity, for self-aggrandizement, are the ones disappointed and discouraged, and the least efficient in the performance of their duties during the war.

In my opinion, the people of a great nation like ours can never sufficiently reward the young men who have so willingly responded to their country's call, and are ready to sacrifice upon the altar of their country their fortunes, their sacred honor, and their lives—I say there is nothing that we can do which will reward them for the sacrifice they are willing to make. I am reminded of the words falling from the immaculate lips of our Savior when He said:

Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

Most of these men have volunteered to go to the front and fight our battles upon foreign soil. They are all aware, as we are, that in war, and especially in a world conflict such as is now being waged, the responsibilities are grave and the dangers great.

But while we are unable to recompensate these men for their services, patriotism, and devotion to their country, we ought to be willing to relieve the friends of a large majority of these patriotic men from the burden of taxation, both while this war lasts and in time to come.

I do not believe, sir, that these men who so willingly go to the front are doing so for popularity. No man who fully considers the question of war, and who has any realization of life and death, goes on the battle field for popularity or because it is pleasing to him. The soldier enters upon the field of battle because his soul is filled with patriotism and devotion to his country. His heart is not filled with hatred but with love, and with a firm belief that it is his solemn duty to obey command to serve and protect his country, and the principles for which his country stands.

But while our gallant young men so willingly take up arms in defense of their country, determined to continue the fight until crowned with victory, victory for humanity, they know as we know that no war can be said to end in victory unless it is fought for the principles of justice and equality; for principles which in the future will benefit humanity. No victory is worth the name unless it is won in the interest of liberty and freedom; for the benefit of humanity; for the relief of oppression; and for the establishment of real democracy.

No war can end and be worthy of the name of victory unless it is based upon equality and justice, and everyone must be given the privilege of sharing in the responsibilities.

Now that our young men have been conscripted to fight this war, let us be charitable to the men of wealth. Let us give them an opportunity to show their patriotism; let us give them an opportunity to do what is in their power to do; let them show their patriotism by paying the cost of the war and by accepting the same salary that the private soldier receives. The captains of industry and the profiteers of big business who are given the privilege of carrying on their business and of saving their lives, should not object to be put on the same basis and receive the same pay as our soldiers who stand ready to shed their blood on the field of battle, and if they are imbued with true patriotism they will not object to doing so.

I am afraid that the chairman of the committee, in his criticism of "certain men" in making this war unpopular failed to show his usual keenness of vision. His mind has already changed and higher rates are now proposed. If we are really conscious of the sufferings of a brutal war, we can entertain little hope of making it popular by newspaper articles, speeches, or legislation which provides merely for the appropriation of money for the prosecution of the war.

To say that a soldier goes to war for the pay he receives is a challenge of his patriotism, but what about the man who stays at home and is allowed to enjoy freedom and liberty in safety and peace; is allowed to be with his family, to carry on his business or profession? Why do we not ask him to be content with the same pay and to place himself in the same position as the soldier who is in danger of losing his life every moment of his service? Why is it asking too much of the man who does not have to fight to be satisfied with the soldier's pay and the soldier's ration during the war?

Shall it be said that any of our citizens are guilty, consciously guilty, of the crime of coining the blood of our American boys into dollars? I can not believe, sir, that there is in this country any large number of citizens so brutal and devoid of conscience, either among the middle class or the rich class, who are knowingly willing to perpetrate the unpardonable sin against humanity of making profits at the sacrifice of our best blood. Shall it be said by the future historian that we have among us men so devoid of conscience that they are willing to withhold the profits made during the war, while our heroes are pouring out their life's blood upon the field of battle? I say, is there a man with a vision so obscure and a soul so dead that he knowingly and willfully refuses to do his share and to assume the responsibility which rests upon every citizen of our Republic to do his full duty? In the words of the poet:

If such a man there be, go mark him well,
For him no minstrel raptures swell.

Is it wise for statesmen to quibble about the percentage of rates to be taxed against wealth and profits made during the war and at the same time ask millions of our young men to sacrifice their all upon the altar of our country? And I ask, shall it be for the benefit of democracy and humanity, or shall conditions be made such that the cost of the war will be an increased burden only upon those who are least able to bear it?

It can not be said that we are taxing wealth to its utmost when we take $562,000,000, as first reported by the committee, or, as I understand, the new provision now offered will take one billion and some sixty million dollars. It can not be said that we are taxing wealth to its utmost when we know that every year eight to ten billion dollars are being received by a few men.

We are now at war, and every person who considers himself worthy of the name of a citizen of this country should be glad to do his full duty. Every man, woman, and child who loves this country and its free institutions and the privileges enjoyed must sympathize with those who so willingly have offered their services for our benefit in the interest of democracy and humanity. The least we can do is to contribute from our wealth in proportion with our ability to do so, in order that these men shall be amply provided with food and clothing, with everything necessary to carry on the war.

The question of taxation against borrowing for financing the war is one which will not be settled by the mere passage of this bill, and unless the rates on both incomes and profits are materially increased it will furnish a subject for discussion and will be made an issue in the political campaigns in the future until the question is more equitably settled. The fight will be carried on until social justice shall have been established.

Every dollar of the cost of the war must be paid in cash, and every dollar must come from citizens of our own country. In other words, we borrow from ourselves and burden our people with an enormous interest-bearing debt at a time when the country is able, and I believe willing, to meet these expenses on a cash basis.

To argue that future generations should help pay for this war does not change the issue. The facts are that the practice of borrowing when we are able to pay cash is a practice fundamentally wrong both in principle and morals and is economically unsound; this rule is sound and would apply to financing the Government as well as individuals and corporations. Looking at this question from a purely financial standpoint, it can not be said to be a sound proposition if based upon the science of raising and expending the public revenue to raise more than 50 per cent of the money we expend from the sale of bonds. And we should not borrow for a longer time than 10 years.

If this war shall last two years it will cost us not less than $40,000,000,000, and if we borrow twenty billions, drawing a rate of interest of 4 per cent, and subject to taxation, we shall have an annual interest charge of $800,000,000. I do not believe that any disinterested person who is skilled in finance and understands sound economics would differ with me from the conclusion I have just stated.

We are advised that the Treasury estimates to Congress for the fiscal year of 1918 will be $21,000,000,000, and according to a statement made by Mr. KIRCHIN, the majority leader of the House, nineteen billions will be needed for the expenses up to June 30, 1918, and the $2,000,000,000 extra will be used as an emergency fund.

The twenty-one billions would be raised as follows: Bonds for the allied loans, seven billions; pending revenue bill, three billions; war certificates, four billions; bonds for domestic purposes already authorized, two billions; proposed new bonds, two billions; war-savings certificates, two billions; and regular revenue, one billion three hundred millions.

With this tremendous bond issue staring us in the face, we can not justify our position if we raise less than two-thirds of the amount provided for in the pending bill from war profits.

In fact, we ought to raise all of it in the pending bill and not make it a consumption tax, taxed upon those who can not afford to pay it.

It is evident, therefore, that the rates on the larger incomes and the rates on the war profits must be materially increased. It is a mistake, both from an economical and fundamental standpoint, for the Government to issue bonds exempt from taxation. It must be apparent to everyone that the men of wealth can take their incomes and profits, and especially the profits made during the war, and invest them in these noninterest-bearing bonds, and thereby forever escape taxation.

I do not think we want to do that. I do not think it is safe for a nation, any more than an individual or a corporation, when his resources are ample, when he is able to pay cash, to mortgage the future or to mortgage his resources and burden his business with enormous interest-bearing debts. That is exactly what will be done if we raise these large amounts by the sale of bonds.

I was very glad to hear the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] say the other day that the leaders of this body—he did not use that word, but I assume that he meant the leaders of this body—are now having in mind the importance of issuing these bonds as tax-bearing instruments. Shall it be said that we are willing to allow men who make these billions to invest them in nontaxable bonds, to be exempt forever from taxation? Yet the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] this morning was dwelling upon the fact that we are burdening the wealth too heavily in this bill. These men would not pay any taxes upon their swollen fortunes. Their profits would be invested in bonds and they will be exempt from all kinds of taxation. But where does the burden fall, I ask Senators? Upon men with modest means, and upon the poor men, and no business institution, no man who is known as a financier will dare tell you that it will be a sound proposition to finance this war upon the issue of bonds and then permit the men who are making their profits during the war to invest them in securities which never could be taxed. I think it must be very easy to understand that. It is to me.

If you will pardon me for digressing just a moment, the Senator from Ohio alluded to the fact that we have in this country soap-box orators. That is true, but what does it illustrate? If the Senator from Ohio had taken a second sober thought he would have realized that there would be no soap-box oratory unless there were conditions unsatisfactory to some of the people of the country. I shall welcome the time when there will be no necessity for soap-box orators, when we may all be able to hold our meetings in gilded halls such as the Senator from Ohio and I would occupy. But such are not the conditions to-day, and the argument of the Senator from Ohio proves to be a fallacy. He sets up a man of straw when he criticizes men in poor circumstances because they are compelled to speak from soap boxes in the streets of our cities.

Those who have been my neighbors for years know that I believe in the competitive system. I have never been known as a radical or as a disorganizer, if you will pardon me for alluding to myself. I have always believed in law and order. But the man who can not see that this war is a tremendous burden which is being fastened upon the public and upon the masses and will bear most heavily upon them is a man whose vision is too dull to occupy a place in this body. Eight hundred million dollars in interest alone! We used to think that that was a pretty respectable appropriation for a whole year when I first entered the other body, some 14 years ago. If the Government of the United States appropriated $800,000,000 a year, we were afraid to go back to our constituents and face them and say that we had appropriated $800,000,000 for one fiscal year. We used to think a billion-dollar Congress was a monstrosity.

Where is this money to come from? Where are the $40,000,000,000 we are going to expend in two years to come from? Are you going to go to the allies and borrow it? Have you any hope of getting anything from Germany? Will not the people of the United States be compelled to furnish this money? If the money is here, why burden the poor people not only during this generation but for generations to come? Why burden the poor people with an interest-bearing debt of a billion dollars a year? Yet you call that sound economics, sound financiering; and because, forsooth, some Member of this body shall see fit to criticize this provision of the bill and call attention to the fact that the rate of taxation on the swollen fortunes is too low those Members must be designated and characterized as disloyal. When you insert provisions which at least some of us believe will be saddled upon the backs of the toiling millions, we are performing a patriotic duty when we call attention to it, are we not?

I hope that I may not be understood as having any motive whatever in saying that we should take from the people of this country who can afford to pay these taxes and make them pay the cost of the war. I hope in the criticism which I expect to be made that at least it will not be characterized as disloyalty to my Government or as unpatriotic for calling the Senate's attention to this. I have said that I believe every citizen ought to pay a tax, but I believe that taxation should be based upon justice and equality. I believe that it should be in proportion to a man's ability to pay.

In my judgment, we can not go before the American people and justify our position on this question unless we change this bill, unless we increase the rates to be charged on incomes and profits, thereby raising a larger amount of cash and reducing the amount to be raised from the sale of bonds. I for one do not believe that the American people will approve our action. It can not be said that we are fighting a war for democracy and for humanity if we lay the burden of taxation upon future generations, upon the poor as well as the rich, so long as there is sufficient wealth in the land to pay that cost at this time.

It may be that I misunderstand the meaning of the word democracy, but I have always been taught to believe that it is government by the people; that it is a form of government in which the supreme power is retained and directly or indirectly exercised by the people, or that it is government by popular representation. But regardless of whether it is a government directly represented by the people or by representatives of the people or by delegated authority the sovereign power still rests with the people, and unless laws are made in accordance with the wishes of the people, which make it possible for all the people to share in the blessings as well as the burdens of government, it can not be said to be in the interest of true democracy.

Why should we burden future generations by the sale of bonds, leaving the debt for them to pay, and not pay it out of the war income or the war profits, because when this war is over this surtax will no longer apply to war profits. I am sure that it will not be applied to those with large fortunes and wealth, and this is the only time to impose a heavy tax upon war profits, if we intend to do even-handed justice to all the people.

I find in a book written by Prof. King, of the University of Wisconsin, that 65 per cent of the poorest people of the population of Wisconsin, in the year 1900, owned 5.2 per cent of the wealth and of the lower middle class 65 per cent to 80 per cent of the people of Wisconsin owned 4.8 per cent of the wealth of that State. Of the upper middle class 80 to 98 per cent of the people of Wisconsin owned, in the year 1900, 33 per cent of the wealth of that State, and that the richest, or 2 per cent of the people of Wisconsin, owned 57 per cent of the wealth of that State. That is in the State of Wisconsin. I have read a statement issued by a number of college and university professors who claim that on an average, taking the whole country, 2 per cent of the people of the United States own 65 per cent of the wealth, and that 98 per cent of the people own only 35 per cent of the wealth.

I should like to hear from some genius who can defend the proposition of issuing long-time bonds to be paid back by future generations, not by you and me, but by our children and our children's children. If I wanted to take the time of the Senate, I could prove that bonds were bought in 1870 and 1871 by people of this country from the French Government and that never up to this hour have those bonds been paid. The people of France from year to year are being burdened by these perpetual bonds. The people of France have had all they could do to pay the interest. You are going to fasten the same burdens on the American people, and yet you are fighting a war for democracy and for humanity.

I ask that the table in Prof. King's book may be inserted as an appendix to my remarks. I do not care to go into details. The figures are very interesting, and I am sure they will be beneficial to all Senators here, if they will take the time to study them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Without objection, permission will be granted.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, is it any wonder then, that we hear murmurings and protests coming from a large majority of the citizenship of this country, asking for information regarding this war; asking to know how it is possible to establish an honorable peace? They know, sir, that they are the ones who have to pay the cost of this war, unless we at this time make the few individual citizens who are making such huge profits pay heavily, those citizens who are now making tremendous fortunes in the industrial field, who are now making profits which in the future will be a menace to the rank and file, profits which will enable a very few people to control the industries and the industrial field of this entire country. I ask, is it treason for these people, knowing as they do that millions of heroic lives, the best blood of this Nation, will be sacrificed, to feel that they have a right to ask upon what terms it is possible to establish an honorable peace and at as early a time as possible?

But when a Senator utters a statement like this, I think I know what runs through the minds of some men if it does not penetrate their hearts. In defiance of that, however, and in disregard not of criticism—for I welcome criticism—but of utter disregard of the possibility of slanderous and libelous attacks, which may be directed against those who conscientiously believe that we have a right to discuss these questions. I hope no man will so forget himself in the future that he will characterize the men who want to see an honorable peace established—not a peace at any price; no, but an honorable peace—either as disloyal or pro-German.

No citizen of this country who has any realization of the fundamentals of government, and who knows what loyalty means, and what patriotism means, would ask that this Government shall lay down its arms upon any other condition than the establishment of an honorable peace in the interest of justice, of humanity, and for the benefit of future generations as well as our own.

I have but little patience with those who are always willing to offer lip service as their share of the burden incident to war, for the perpetuation of the liberty and freedom of the people of this Government. And when I hear the expression that there is the fear that we are making this war unpopular by imposing just and equitable taxes upon those who can well afford to pay them, I am more inclined to offer commiseration than criticism and condemnation.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I gladly yield.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator from North Dakota think it would tend to make the war popular to have a revenue bill levying taxes on coffee and tea and sugar and parcel-post packages and articles of that character, while permitting these tremendous war profits to go without bearing a very large portion of taxation?

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator for calling my attention to that. I do not believe the course he suggests would be popular, and it is for that purpose that I have said these few words on the floor of the Senate. I know that the purpose of men who have been cooperating with me was to eliminate consumption taxes, the tax upon the energy and the efforts of the man of moderate means and especially the poor man. It is for that we are fighting. I believe I may say to the Senator from Iowa that I know it is his purpose to see that those things are eliminated.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator think that the men who are fighting to take the taxes off consumption in this bill can be justly charged with trying by so doing to make the war unpopular, as they have been charged on this floor?

Mr. GRONNA. No; I want to answer the Senator most emphatically no, and while I do not say there is any way of making the war popular, the elimination of those taxes would make the war what might be called at least bearable, for it is absolutely unbearable, I will say to the Senator from Iowa, to saddle these enormous additional taxes upon the necessities that everybody uses, the poor as well as the rich.

We need not deceive ourselves with the idea that the people are ignorant as to the facts. Because a man is not a member of this body is no reason he can not think. The people do think; they are going to keep on thinking until the next election; and then they will still continue to think and to act.

So that I may not be misunderstood, I would not if I could take away from anybody, from any person, firm, or corporation during this war the opportunity of making profits. I want them to continue to make profits; but I also believe that it is our duty to take these profits, or at least a large portion of them, and use them for the benefit of the Government to pay its expenses during the war.

I do not wish to set up a false standard denying the American business man, the professional man, or the producer the opportunity of making profits during the war. But in order to make that standard perfect we must also bear in mind that the scale of wages must be increased; that the man who depends on labor for his living should have his pay increased; and I know of no other method that can be based upon sound economic principles during the period of war than to let high prices prevail, let large profits be made, but keep in mind the tolling millions who have been unable to lay up anything for a rainy day. Their pay must be increased also; their families must be clothed and fed and their opportunities should not be lessened by the increased cost of living, and their day's labor should buy as much food and clothing to-day as it would in times of peace.

We are a great Nation, and for more than a century and a quarter we have enjoyed the blessings and liberty provided for in the Constitution. Every citizen of our land, whether a natural-born citizen or of foreign birth, has sworn allegiance to this sacred document, which is still recognized as the fundamental law of our land, as it was intended to be when established and consecrated by the fathers. It is for the protection of these cherished principles, for the perpetuation of liberty and freedom, for equality and justice, and for the rights of humanity that we stand ready to sacrifice so costly a treasure in blood and money.

Mr. President, I realize, of course, that anything I have said may not change the result when a vote is taken upon this important question, but I feel that I owe it to the people whom I in part represent that I should state my views and give my reasons for casting my votes as I shall upon the different provisions of this bill.

I think I realize as everybody now must realize that we are dealing with questions of great importance. I think we all realize that before this war shall end our sacrifices of men and money will be tremendously large. I hope that it will not be said that we are in this war because we love to fight. I trust that I may be justified in saying that we are in this war for no other purpose than the welfare of humanity, for liberty and freedom, and for the establishment of an honorable and lasting peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Harding	Martin	Simmons
Brady	Hitchcock	New	Smith, Md.
Calder	Hollis	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Husting	Overman	Smoot

Fernald	Jones, N. Mex.	Poinexter	Swanson
Fletcher	Jones, Wash.	Ransdell	Thompson
France	Kellogg	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Kenyon	Shafer	Weeks
Gronna	Knox	Sheppard

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand that the question about to be put by the Chair is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment reported by the committee?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I offer as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama and for the suggested committee amendment the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 201, down to and including line 22, on page 13 of the committee amendment to Title II, and to insert the following:

SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and other taxes under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax, hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax, equal to 73 per cent of the war profits, determined as hereinafter provided.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from California that his amendment is not a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, but is simply an amendment offered to a part of the committee amendment which the Senator from Alabama moves to strike out; in other words, it is an amendment to perfect a part of the proposition which the Senator from Alabama moves to strike out. As I understand, the Senator from California simply proposes to strike out that part of section 201 from the first of the section down to line 23, on page 13, and offers in place of that what has been read.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington is quite correct, and doubtless in suggesting this as a substitute I indulged in a misnomer. It is, indeed, an amendment to what has been proposed by the Senator from Alabama and an amendment to but a part of it relating to section 201. In that aspect I think that the amendment is in order.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from California is in terms and, I think, in fact an amendment to the amendment which has been offered by the majority of the committee. Now, there are pending before the Senate at the present time a committee amendment, which is a motion to substitute for Title II of the House bill, and also a substitute offered by the Senator from Alabama. We have those two sections pending before the Senate at the same time, and either the original committee amendment or the Bankhead substitute must be open to amendment. Therefore, clearly the amendment offered by the Senator from California is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the amendment offered by the Senator from California is in order. The question is on the adoption of that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand the Senator from California now desires to speak to his amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not at present. I desire to make some observations on it later.

Mr. SIMMONS. We are about to vote on it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we vote upon this amendment, I send to the desk and ask the Secretary to read a dispatch from Paris with reference to the war-profits tax which has just been fixed in France.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EIGHTY PER CENT TAX ON WAR PROFITS IN FRANCE—FINANCE MINISTER ANNOUNCES PLAN THAT IS TO BE ADOPTED.

PARIS, August 30.

France proposes to put the cost of the war on those best able to bear it by taxing war profits up to 80 per cent.

Minister of Finance Thierry made this announcement to-day in an interview with the United Press explaining France's scheme of financing the war. He added a special plea that Americans aid France by purchasing their luxuries from French factories—these industries yielding a large part of France's taxes:

"We in France are following very closely the financial debates in America," declared M. Thierry. "We appreciate the difficulties and the new problems before America, especially the problems of taxation for war purposes."

"Effective legislation regarding the latter has been difficult, particularly in France, where there was no income tax before the war. This lack has made it necessary for us to establish the fixed revenue in before-the-war periods in order to tax the excess."

FRANCE'S WAR PROFIT.

"The war profits in France during the first year of the war have been estimated at $550,000,000. The second year was about the same. But collections have been slow, owing to the difficulty in establishing the taxable sums."

"To date only about $400,000,000 has been collected."

"Our law of July, 1916, taxed war profits under $500,000 50 per cent."

"We are now introducing a law taxing those profit-makers' revenues of more than a million dollars a maximum of 80 per cent, according to a sliding scale."

"The French nation is well able to bear the larger share of war expenses. To date she has contributed $13,000,000,000. But this is hardly a fifth of the total war cost. New taxes will add a billion of state revenues to this."

SYSTEM FLEXIBLE.

"It is naturally difficult for France to subject large properties and industries to any general tax because many industries are now no longer in operation. The invasion by the Germans seized many of our plants. But the French fiscal system is most democratic and most flexible."

"We feel confident our new legislation will have the desired results, namely, in throwing the main burden of taxation on our richer classes."

"Of the various French war loans, the most successful has been our 5 per cent short-term national-defense bonds. They continue to be an increasing source of revenue and are now averaging a return of over a billion dollars in new money."

"This is the best proof of the public confidence in the financial strength of the country."

TO CONSOLIDATE STRENGTH.

"Our aim now is to consolidate this strength and safeguard our financial prestige to enable France to fulfill all her obligations to the allies."

"If we accomplish this, it is essential that France continue her economic effort for a long period after the war."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in reply to the newspaper article just read at the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that France only imposes a 10 per cent maximum rate upon incomes. Under the pending bill the Senate has already agreed to a maximum tax rate upon incomes of 60 per cent, and, taking into consideration the income tax imposed by the pending bill and the rates that are proposed by the committee as excess profits, the taxation upon the great volume of business in the United States will be about 80 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this 80 per cent tax is laid upon the war profits of France after two years of exceedingly heavy taxation preceding this levy. The United States for the last three years has enjoyed the exceptional advantage of having a tremendous business without any outlay, comparatively speaking, for the war. In other words, the war profits which have been accumulated for the last two years have not been taxed at all. France, notwithstanding the heavy taxation which has gone on for the last three years, and notwithstanding the fact that her industries have been depleted in man power by calling her citizens to the battle line, is now placing an 80 per cent tax upon war profits, and is doing so after her experience and her observation as to the effect of the heavy taxation which has heretofore preceded it.

I call the Senator's attention to the further fact that there is now an 80 per cent tax upon war profits in England after a 40 per cent tax in 1915 and a 60 per cent tax in 1916; that there is now being placed upon the war profits in England a tax of 80 per cent; and if the London "Statist" be correct, the industries of England have never indicated a greater productive efficiency at any time in their history than they are indicating now.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator has said, I want to call attention to the fact that France, in taxing her so-called war profits or excess profits—they are really excess profits—imposed a graduated tax from 5 per cent as a minimum to 35 per cent as a maximum, and at no time did she ever impose more than 10 per cent on income tax. Last year France concluded to raise more revenue through taxation, as the amount she was raising in taxes from all sources was not much more than 14 per cent of her expenditures; so she decided to raise the tax upon excess profits to 50 per cent, and that is the law to-day in France—50 per cent on excess profits and a maximum of 10 per cent on incomes; and France has been at war for over three years.

What is proposed now? The amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] proposes that we add a further burden upon business to the amount of 73 per cent of all profits over and above 10 per cent; and besides this 73 per cent the bill provides for a 6 per cent flat normal tax, making 79 per cent; and the present law imposes a tax of 50 cents upon every thousand dollars of capital stock of a concern, which means that we are to impose upon the business interests of this country a flat tax of 80 per cent on all profits over and above 10 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Utah, with his consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. My design is to return ultimately to the very well-considered plan of the Finance Committee for the computation of war profits, the plan that the committee adopted after two months of serious and very earnest and industrious effort—not to the plan that it adopted overnight very recently.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I am speaking to the Senator's amendment as it was offered.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is the first one.

Mr. SMOOT. No Senator knows whether the Senate will return to the original plan of exemption of the committee or not. In fact, I think I can say right now that there are not enough votes in the Senate to adopt that plan.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. May I suggest that if there are enough votes to adopt this amendment there will be enough votes to return to that plan.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt it very much. I know that the sentiment of the country and the sentiment of the Senate as it exists to-day is not going to allow great fortunes that are being made, and were made before the war, to go untaxed. I do not believe the people of this country are going to approve of nearly all the railroads of the country being exempted from paying a cent of excess-profits tax. I do not believe the people of this country are ready to say to Mr. Henry Ford, "Notwithstanding the fact that you made $54,000,000 in the year 1916 you shall be exempt from paying one cent of excess-profits or war taxes."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator, in all sincerity, why it was that the committee did not discover that after eight weeks of investigation?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can say, as far as I am personally concerned as a member of the committee, that I discovered it long before the bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. This is the most remarkable debate, I think, that I have ever known. When the committee report came out in the first instance any man who disagreed with it was supposed to be a friend of the Kaiser and attempting to make the war unpopular. They have since gone back into the committee room and have indorsed a principle which was at war with every principle which was contained in their original report.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator unfortunately does not know the history of the actions taken by the committee, and I am constrained to tell him now what they were.

When the majority of the committee adopted the prewar period, and when they decided that they would tax war profits only, it was understood by all the country, based upon a public statement made by the Secretary of the Treasury, that it was necessary that $3,600,000,000 be raised for the fiscal year 1918 over and above the revenues to be raised under existing law, and the Secretary of the Treasury recommended not only to the committee of the House but to the committee of the Senate that one-half of that amount be raised by bonds and one-half by taxation. So, after considering this recommendation by the Secretary of the Treasury, it was decided that if the amount named was all that was to be raised, and if that would pay the expenses of government for the fiscal year 1918, it would be the part of wisdom to raise the greater part of it from incomes and war profits. But after the bill had been reported to the Senate, Mr. President, and after it had been returned to the committee ostensibly because of an amendment that I offered that would have ultimately secured prohibition in the United States, there came to the Committee on Appropriations further estimates for appropriations of which I was well aware; and Senators will remember that I stood upon the floor of the Senate and called the attention of the country to the fact that there was no question in my mind but that the appropriations that would be requested for the fiscal year 1918 would amount to $17,000,000,000. I received telegrams from all over the United States asking me if I was not mistaken in that estimate. I received letters from business men all over the country expressing surprise that I should make such a statement—a statement that was contrary to all of the estimates made by the department—and wanting to know upon what theory I made it, and what basis I had for making it.

Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, I knew what had already been appropriated, I knew of the estimates that had been sent to that committee for deficiency appropriations, I knew what the appropriations that had been made were to cover, and I felt sure that the appropriations would amount close to the seventeen billions I have stated.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that all the proceedings leading up to the framing of this revenue bill have been seriously embarrassed by the failure to get a definite and final estimate as to the prospective expenditures. On July 8, as I recall the date, the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Finance Committee and gave us what was said to be his final estimate; and hardly had we completed the consideration of the bill when he came in and wanted over $5,000,000,000 more.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator remembers that the chairman of the committee wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury asking him to send to the committee his estimates as to what the receipts of the Government would be for the fiscal year 1918, and the expenditures for that same year; and the estimate was furnished the committee, as the Senator well knows, showing that the amount to be raised would be sufficient if the original estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury was provided for.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further—because I think this is a very good opportunity to call attention to the matter—the Secretary came along afterwards, after the committee had been toiling arduously for over two months, and several weeks after this so-called final estimate, with a further requisition of some five billion five hundred million, more or less, more.

Now, it may be said that the Secretary of the Treasury is only the channel through which these estimates must be presented to the Congress. That may be true; but if he is not subject to grave criticism, certainly the administration is subject to the gravest kind of criticism for not letting the Finance Committee know earlier what the final amount of the estimate would be. In this last estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, two billion five hundred million was for field artillery, and it is absurd to say that the War Department did not know until nearly August that battles must be fought in Europe with field artillery, and that $2,500,000,000 would be needed for that purpose.

If the Senator will just permit me one more word, I think that what the business world in the United States demands—and the demand is getting more overwhelming and insistent every day—is that we should know what is the final estimate of the cost of this war, at least for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to ask the Senator from Utah, before he proceeds with the figures he intends to present to the Senate, if he would not be willing to define what the committee called war profits, what amount they expect to raise from war profits, what the committee regard as normal or ordinary business profits, and how much they expect to raise from that source. I think that would be very interesting, and it would perhaps enable some of us to comprehend more fully the figures that the Senator intends to present.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Idaho to wait just a moment until I answer the Senator from Alabama, because I think the question he asks is a very pertinent one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the Senator will yield to me before he answers the Senator from Alabama, I should like to say just a word or two in regard to the remarks which have just been made by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

We all agree that if we could have these estimates brought up to date it would be a good thing; but I am afraid the remarks just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania may be misconstrued. I feel quite confident that the War Department has been exerting itself in every reasonable way to get its estimates up to date, but the situation has changed from time to time. It has been necessary to ascertain in detail what our allies are doing toward the prosecution of the war and to formulate plans for this Government with reference to the plans which our allies have adopted. I do not believe the administration or the War Department or the Navy Department are really subject to the criticisms which the Senator from Pennsylvania has just made. I think if the work of those departments were understood the country would feel satisfied that they have been just as expeditious in these matters as reasonable and diligent effort could bring about. I do not believe they are subject to these criticisms; and while, of course, I am not going to suggest that the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania ought not to have been made, yet I do not believe they can serve any good purpose. I think the country understands that these departments are exerting themselves in every possible way to forward preparation along every line, and from the evidence which was presented to the committee I certainly was impressed with the fact that they had been doing this as expeditiously as could have been expected.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will allow me just one word further I shall be through.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator mean to say that the Finance Committee were not entitled to the information that $2,500,000,000, more or less, would be required for field artillery until they had completed the consideration of this bill, and that the War Department did not wake up to the fact that battles must be fought with field artillery until close on to August?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator, of course, would have appreciated, as other members of the committee would have done, information regarding those matters; but the evidence which was presented to the committee, as I recall it, disclosed the fact that investigations along different and extensive lines had to be made and were being made; that they had to ascertain just the share of the work and the burdens that were going to be placed upon this Government in the prosecution of the war in France.

While I agree with the Senator that it would have been a very satisfactory thing and a very convenient thing for us to have had these various estimates sooner, yet I do not believe there is any evidence here—certainly there was none before the committee of which I have any knowledge—that there has been any undue delay in any department. They had been careful in making their estimates. They were extensive. They comprised vast undertakings. We have only been in this war a comparatively short time, and when it comes to making out specific estimates such as were made out and as the facts were presented to the committee, instead of being astonished at the delay, I am astonished that they were able to furnish the detailed information which they did furnish within the time they did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not going to get into any controversy with the Senator as to whether the Secretary of the Treasury was lax in his duties or not; but I will say to the Senator that, as a member of the committee, he knows that when the estimate of the Secretary was received by the committee, at the request of the chairman of the committee, showing the receipts and the disbursements for the fiscal year 1918, I made the statement then and there that the estimate was not correct; that I was positive that there would be at least $3,500,000,000 additional asked for, and so told the committee at the time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator is quite correct, and the committee generally anticipated more than had been officially estimated for.

Mr. SMOOT. But the members of the committee did not believe that I was correct in my estimate. In answer to the question asked me by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] the war profits that could be considered such were provided for in the bill as it was reported from the committee on August 6, 1917; in other words, the committee has not changed the rate of taxation, nor has it changed its system of taxation, with the exception of adding a minimum and maximum rate of exemption. The war profits under the original committee amendment, and they were all war profits, so called, amounted to $562,000,000; but under the substitute of the committee of Title II the additional tax to be collected will amount to $1,060,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is from the war profits?

Mr. SMOOT. That is from the war profits and excess profits. The war profits, as I stated, would amount to $562,000,000. Therefore, the taxes imposed upon excess profits by the committee substitute would be the difference between the $1,060,000,000 and the $562,000,000, or, in other words, $498,000,000—in round numbers half a billion dollars.

That, I think, answers the Senator's question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am not quite satisfied that that does furnish me the information that I am sure the Senator will be able to give. What I should like to know is this: When we are talking about war profits or excess profits—and we do not seem to have anything else in mind—I ask the Senator to define and to explain to the Senate what the committee call war profits or on what basis they estimated the revenue to be collected from what they call war profits.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the amount was $562,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know that is the amount; but what I want the Senator to tell is, what are war profits and who pays the war profit, and who pays the normal profit that you do not regard as war profit?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the bill war profits are these: The average earnings of any company in the United States for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, designated "pre-war period," are under the provisions of the bill the normal profits of that company. Now, whatever the profits may be of that same company for the year 1917, the amount exceeding the normal profits of the pre-war years are war profits. That is what the committee in the first place undertook to tax, and that is what they are taxing now; and, in connection with that, they are taxing what may be termed excess profits.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Not war profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Not war profits at all.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is right.

Mr. SMOOT. The excess profits, or, in other words, all profits exceeding a maximum of 10 per cent. That is what the committee substitute now before the Senate really means; and from that source, under Title II, termed "war and excess profits," there will be collected, over and above what was collected from the munitions tax of last year, $1,060,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One more question, Mr. President, and then I will not trouble the Senator further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah further yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, from the statement the Senator has made, it is perfectly evident that these excess profits are the result of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; the excess profits may not be the result of the war. In fact, I will say to the Senator that there are many institutions in this country that have made less profits than they made during the prewar period; or, in other words, the war has adversely affected their business, and their profits are not as great, and will not be as great this year, as they were during the prewar period.

For instance, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are corporations like the American Tobacco Co., the Ford Co., many of the banking institutions of the country, and a large part of the mercantile institutions of the country that are not making a cent more profit now than they were during the prewar period, and many of them a great deal less.

What I want the Senator to understand is this: The excess profits that are intended to be taxed under the committee substitute are all profits over and above 10 per cent, no matter what higher per cent they made during the prewar period or what per cent they are, making to-day. Those are excess profits.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One more question: Under the original bill reported by the committee the institutions to which the Senator has referred—the American Tobacco Co. and the automobile company and a large number of other companies—would have escaped taxes entirely?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as I stated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the reason why the committee brought in this amendment for 6 and 10 per cent exemption.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no intention on the part of the committee to have a misunderstanding about it, and—

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no misunderstanding.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think there should be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What I want to get at is whether it is true that the committee investigated its original plan and found these great corporations were going to escape taxation under it, and if that was not the reason and the inducement to bring in their substitute providing for an excess tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator frankly, as far as I am concerned, and I think as far as the committee is concerned, yes; but that is not the only reason, however. The other reason, and the predominating one, was that the estimates for the expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 are not $3,600,000,000, as the Secretary first reported we would have to raise over and above the taxes raised under existing law, but the estimate had leaped from that amount until—I dare not say, because if we stay in session 10 days longer I think there will be nearly a billion dollars added to what the estimates are to-day. But it became evident to the committee that we must raise more money through direct taxation, and that being the case the committee thought that it was unwise, considering the further development and enlargement of the business of this country that is absolutely necessary under the present war conditions, to impose a greater tax upon war profits than we had done in the first instance, taking into consideration the heavy income taxes imposed, and therefore it had to look elsewhere for a further source of taxation. And what was that source?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. Just let me finish the sentence. The source, Mr. President, and the easiest one and the most just one, was to reach the institutions that were making excessive profits before the war, and also during the war, and tax those excess profits. That is the reason why your committee made the change. That is the reason why we are here asking that that change be made, so as to take from such institutions a fair proportion of those excess profits for war purposes. Now, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator from Alabama asked the Senator from Utah a question that has been more or less confused, not only in my mind but in the minds of a great many Senators with whom I have talked. Do I understand the Senator from Utah to say that in the original provision as introduced you did not put a tax on the excess profits? I am speaking now of excess profits in contradistinction from war profits. You did not add a tax on excess profits until after the bill had been recommitted.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but not recommitted, not until the committee reported a second substitute.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes. Now, what I wanted to get clear in my mind was that the original draft of the provision as presented here contemplated a profits tax on war profits alone.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The contention that has been made by some here on the floor was that enormous profits, prewar profits, were extended into and were still more greatly swollen by war conditions, and that those prewar profits, no matter how excessive, were escaping taxation under the committee's bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But under the present form of it you have now divided the tax between war profits per se and excess profits.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I wanted to get that clearly in my mind, because in speaking about these profits we have confused excess profits with war profits, and the impression was going abroad that certain individuals as well as corporations, who had been enjoying enormous profits previous to the war by virtue of that, would escape all taxation entirely and only those who have been fortunate in having a little excess profits during the war would pay any tax at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that my office is filled nearly every morning, since we reported the substitute, with men representing institutions that under the original committee amendment would not pay a dollar of excess-profits tax. One of them this morning came to me and tried to convince me that the change was an outrage upon the business of the country. After he had talked about 15 minutes I asked him what concern he represented. He told me what concern it was. I asked, "What profit were you making in 1911, 1912, and 1913?" He told me the amount that they made, but not the percentage. I happened to know exactly what the capital stock of the company was and I figured the profits made as named was about 890 per cent per annum. Then when I asked him if he thought that a company which was making 890 per cent during the prewar period, and was not making any more than that now, should escape taxation, he said, "Of course, we ought to escape taxation. We are entitled to the 890 per cent." I said, "As far as I am concerned, I do not want to spend any more time discussing the question with the representative of a company that claims any such percentage of gain as being just to the American people."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The explanation of the Senator from Utah is satisfactory to me. What I wanted to bring out, and what I have successfully brought out, is that the committee in framing its first bill after laboring for months brought in a proposition that exempted a great many of the very large, rich corporations of the country from taxation. That being true, the efforts that some of us have made to present that question to the country has had a very happy effect. It has brought to the attention of the committee the mistake that they made in the first draft of their bill. I want to say that the committee's amendment is a vast improvement on the original bill, and those of us who undertook to expose the enormities of the original provision are entitled to a great deal of credit for that result.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to rob any persons of any credit that they think they are entitled to, but I want to say right now that if $562,000,000 would be a sufficient amount to collect for the present fiscal year, or if the second estimates from the Treasury Department as to the cost of this war had not been so greatly increased, as far as the committee is concerned, it would have collected the $562,000,000 from war profits alone; but when the amount estimated for began to increase by the billions the committee decided it had to look for increased revenue from other sources, because if it had provided for the collection of twice the amount provided for in the original committee amendment from war profits alone, I will say to the Senator, there is no question in my mind but that many institutions making war profits only would have been bankrupted shortly after the close of the war. I want the Senator to do me the honor to listen to what I have to say when I come to that part of the committee's substitute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be very much pleased to do so; but just one more word and I promise not to say anything more. I understand the Senator admits that if there had been no increased estimate of cost that the committee and the Senator from Utah would have been satisfied to have permitted these large corporations to have escaped taxation altogether.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says "the Senator from Utah." I want to say that the Senator from Utah did not take that position at any time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the committee took it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will admit that a majority of the committee did, and I do not know but that they were right, considering the amount that was to be collected, as the amount would not have interfered with the productive activity of the companies so taxed. The Senator from Alabama—in fact, both Senators—think that it is almost a crime that the committee abandoned its original amendment—

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no, Mr. President; I can not permit that.

Mr. SMOOT. And introduced a new substitute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will not permit the Senator to say that, because I have just said it was a very great improvement on their original plan, and I am very glad they have come to the conclusion that we reached some time ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps I had better limit my statement, then, to the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], because he laid great stress upon it yesterday, and we were taken to task because we had actually offered a substitute for the original amendment of the committee to the House provision. The senior Senator from Alabama himself offered a substitute for the original committee amendment; and made a most exhaustive argument, an argument the like of which I had never heard him make upon this floor upon any subject since I have been in the Senate of the United States. His argument was well presented, and, hampered as he was by a poor subject, nevertheless it was presented in a most masterly way. But that is past and gone; and the Senator has offered a substitute to take its place, with an entirely different system of taxation, that is now pending for the Senate committee substitute, and if that is defeated the Senator will offer another one in another form, so we are informed by the Senator himself. So it seems to me that the criticism offered yesterday on the committee is rather uncalled for.

Mr. President, I want the Senators of the United States to understand that this is a period in the history of our country when calmness of judgment should prevail. Now is not the time to appeal to the passions and prejudices of the people of this country. Senators, the industries of the country are at stake. The future prosperity of the country is involved in the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and if the Senate adopts it there can be no further extension of the industries of this country as long as the unjust rate of taxation proposed remains upon our statute books.

If we had only one form of taxation in this bill and we were only considering the imposition of a tax upon excess profits or war profits, that would make a great deal of difference in what I will have to say about the Johnson amendment; but do Senators know, or have they stopped to think, that Title I of the bill, the income-tax provision, imposes rates of taxes on incomes of the country higher than any other country in the world—aye, Mr. President, as high as any other two countries in the world? And now we are asked to impose an 80 per cent rate upon all excess profits, leaving 20 per cent, and of that 20 per cent we are to take another 50 per cent by way of an income tax, leaving 10 per cent in round numbers, to the stockholders.

We have had upon the floor of the Senate our attention called to some of the corporations of the country that are making profits over 100 per cent per annum. Mr. President, I have taken time to examine into the condition of some of those corporations and I want to say now that if the flat rate of 80 per cent or 60 per cent is imposed upon the excess profits of the companies and the income-tax rates as now in the bill is collected there are very few of them that will ever be able at the close of this war to pay a dollar on the dollar they have invested.

Take the Bethlehem Steel Co., that has been referred to so often. The greater part of all the profits made by it from the time the war broke out in Europe up to the present day, as well as all the surplus accumulated for a number of years before, have been either declared as a stock dividend or expended in enlargement and improvements of the plant. The company has taken its excessive profits and built plant after plant. They have spent millions upon millions of dollars in purchasing and placing machinery in those plants. It is true after the close of the war it will have the brick and the mortar; it is true it will be the possessor of the machinery purchased to meet war conditions; it is true it will have paid cash for them; and it is true that in these improvements the production of the company has been increased immensely. But I wish to say now to the Senate that if the war should cease during this fiscal year it would find the company as heavy a borrower as it ever was in all its history, and its millions and tens of millions of dollars that have been placed in the extension and improvement of its plants, in brick and mortar, machinery and equipments, will not be worth much more than 10 cents on a dollar.

I know what happens to idle and unused buildings. God has put the stamp of disapproval upon the idle and the nonuse of everything created by man. Far better for a building if it were occupied; far better for machinery to be running than to lie idle.

Mr. President, that is not all. The so-called swollen profits that are being heralded all over the country arise from other sources; among them let me name the following: Beginning with the year 1915, if a merchant bought a carload of sugar, if he bought a carload of canned goods, if he bought a case of anything, whether it be dry goods or whether it be groceries, his books would show at the end of 30 days, through an advance in the market price of his goods on hand, a handsome profit, and the larger his purchases the greater his profits, as the market price was advancing every day by leaps and bounds.

Mr. President, when the war is over, instead of the prices of merchandise advancing they will decrease in value more rapidly than they advanced, and then the supposed profits will turn to losses, and God help the business that does not provide for the inevitable result.

The Government of the United States is a partner, as it were, in the profits made by individuals and corporations. The individual and the stockholder of a corporation will have to consider the price paid for enlarged plants and idle machinery a part of their profit. The Government of the United States takes nothing but cash for its taxes, which is a share of the profits.

There is one part of this bill that I hope will be amended before it passes, and that is that it be made compulsory upon the part of the corporations of this country to make the payment of taxes imposed in four fixed periods and not left optional with the taxpayer, for, Senators, you know what it would mean to take $2,500,000,000 out of the channels of trade overnight. It would not mean so much if it were taken out of the banks and paid to the Government and the Government placed the amount back into the banks in the communities from which the tax was paid. But that will not be the case. The banks of the Western States realize that when the tax is paid to the Government the money so paid finds its way into the eastern banks. It finds its way to the great money centers, and there is scarcely a dollar of it that is not taken out of business channels in the greater part of the United States.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to inquire if the Senator from Utah knows how much actual money there is in circulation in the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. I could figure it out in a few moments, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. KNOX. I was just wondering what the proportion is.

Mr. SMOOT. I know in round numbers. It is about $5,000,000,000.

Mr. KNOX. It would take half the actual money.

Mr. SMOOT. Half the actual money to pay the taxes imposed, and there is not a Senator here who will stop to think who does not know if that thing happens what effect it will have on the business of the country.

* Mr. President, when the liberty loan was decided upon and the amount that each State was to raise for the purchase of the same based upon population, I was more than pleased that there was not a State in all the Union but that took all the bonds ascribed to them upon that basis. I think it would be perhaps a good time for me to say now that if there are many liberty loans placed in the United States and requests made to purchase the same on the basis of population, there are some of the States in the Union that can not take their pro rata without seriously crippling the business of the State. I know States where nearly every dollar used in the purchase of liberty bonds is at the present time, as far as those States are concerned, out of circulation, and they are feeling the ill effects to-day. The rate of interest to the people of the State is affected adversely. I am fearful that if a State can not respond to the future calls as it did upon the first call its people might be branded as disloyal. I speak of this condition now, with the hope that such a charge will never be made.

Mr. President, it makes very little difference to the great money centers of this country, because as soon as the loan is placed and the bonds issued the money paid for the bonds comes right back into the banks of those money centers and goes into circulation again; but it is quite different with a great many of the small States and particularly the Western States.

Sensors, we have reached the point of danger to the productive activity and efficiency of our country by the taxes imposed under the Senate committee substitute, and I am not certain but that we have passed it. I think it is my duty, not only as a Senator of the United States but as a business man, to call your attention to the fact now so that the mistake may be avoided. I know just as well as I live if the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is adopted there will be no more industrial extensions in this country to speak of unless they are made by direct appropriations by Congress for that purpose. We have now an estimate for an appropriation of $15,000,000 for the erection of buildings and the purchase of machinery for the purpose of making guns with which we intend to fight this war. We were told that it was impossible for the business concerns, which we expect to make the guns, to raise money for the purpose of erecting buildings and buy the machinery for the manufacturing of same, and that appropriation is going to be made.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish the Senator would elucidate a little more fully upon that point, why the Government is compelled to furnish the money in conjunction with great manufacturers to extend their own plants, the Government to take back the extensions and to own the extensions and the machinery at the end of the war. It lies along the same line of thought which the Senator is pursuing.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the officials of the War Department who appeared before the Finance Committee stated that it was impossible to find reliable companies who have a credit sufficient to secure the money for the purpose of erecting the necessary buildings and the purchase of the required machinery for the manufacture of the guns, particularly when it is known beforehand they will be of little value after the close of the war.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. NEW. I think the statements which are being made by the Senator from Utah—

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not suggest the absence of a quorum, for I want to get through as soon as possible, and there are more Senators in the Chamber than usual. I will say to the Senator that if Senators do not want to listen to what the facts are in the case, so far as I am concerned I do not care to have them disturbed. I hope the Senator will not make the suggestion.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, it was my intention to suggest the absence of a quorum. I shall not insist upon it against the objection of the Senator from Utah, but I think that the statements which he is making as facts—and I have no doubt whatever that they are facts—should be brought to the minds of Senators who are to vote upon these questions.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Indiana for what he has said. I can only express the hope not only that Senators who are absent will to-morrow morning read what I am saying, but I also hope my statements will reach the American people.

Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] if he understood what effect his amendment will have upon the industries of the country would insist upon its adoption, for I know, and have always felt in my heart, that of all the Senators he would be among the last to try to do an injustice either to a person or a corporation. A corporation is nothing more nor less than an aggregation of individuals. You can not affect a corporation unless you affect every stockholder in it. This is one of the reasons why I think the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is so unjust. Consider one of the Senator's amendments and take a corporation with a capital of a million dollars. Suppose the excess profits amounted to 10 per cent, the tax would be upon $100,000. Under the amendment the tax imposed would be 17 per cent. Take five companies, each having $200,000 capital, aggregating the same as one company with a capital of $1,000,000, and each have 10 per cent excess profits upon which they will be taxed; and under the amendment, although the aggregate of profit is $100,000, the companies will be taxed only 11 per cent.

Mr. President, the committee adopted a graduated tax, based upon the percentage of gain, because it wanted to be absolutely fair to what may be termed small, medium-sized, and large corporations, and to every stockholder of them. I have a list of some of the largest corporations in the country, and I would, if I had the time, show to the Senate that under the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama they would be taxed 10 per cent, while under the committee amendment these same corporations would be taxed 30 per cent. We provide in the committee substitute that the taxes shall be imposed on the basis of the increase of profits—not upon the amount, not upon a percentage of the capital stock, but upon the increased percentage of gain. Under the Senate committee substitute, if a small company makes an increase of profit of 10 per cent, and a large company makes the same percentage of profit, the rate of taxation for both should be and is the same.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I want to make the same request that was made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] a brief period ago. The only desire, of course, that every Senator has is to arrive at a just conclusion. The Senator from Utah has arrived at a just conclusion from his standpoint; I think I have arrived at a just conclusion from my standpoint; but under the circumstances and because now the pivotal point in relation to the amendment before the Senate is the question of whether or not these rates shall be raised to 73 per cent, I beg the Senator to permit me to suggest the absence of a quorum, and to have the entire Senate listen to his discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not want to repeat anything which I have said. What I have already said is the basis for what I intend to say. The mere fact of my repeating these figures I do not think would be interesting to the absent Senators. I am quite sure that if they desire to act upon what I have said they must read what I have already said to draw any conclusion as to whether my position is right or whether it is wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. In opposition to the Senator's request, I would not indeed make the suggestion, but I should very much prefer that it be made, because I should be very glad to have a larger attendance present.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not make it at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I defer to the Senator's wishes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, before the Senator from Utah leaves the point he was just making with reference to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, I desire to ask him a question. If I understood him correctly, he said that under the committee plan a percentage of the profits is proposed to be taken; that without any reference to the investment and the plant or anything else a percentage of the profits above the normal is to be taken. Am I right in that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right that far, but he must go further and say the rate is based upon the percentage of increase, not on the amount, of profits.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly; it is based upon the percentage of increase; but under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama before we could reach the point where we could take any of these surplus profits we must credit the institution from which the money is taken with the actual value of the plant at the time the excess profits are levied upon.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], however, covered that so completely yesterday that I thought I would not go into it to-day, although I will say this to the Senator: I had a case brought to my attention this morning, though I had heard of it before, which, perhaps, to emphasize what the Senator from North Carolina has already stated, I will relate. A certain ship plying between New York and England, owned by a company incorporated in the United States, cost the company $300,000; it was upon the books of the company as costing $300,000; the capital stock issued upon it was $300,000. The ship was requisitioned, and what do you think the owners of the ship claimed it was worth? They claimed it was worth $2,500,000, and they made that claim because the profits it was making from trips between New York and England paid a fair rate of interest on $2,500,000. That ship was not taken until arbitrators had passed upon its value and agreed upon $2,000,000. Under the amendment of the Senator from Alabama the owners would be entitled to 8 per cent upon $2,000,000 as an exemption instead of 8 per cent on the $300,000, which they had paid for the ship. Not only that, but they had used the ship for years and had benefited by the wear and tear of it, and if they kept their books in a business way there would have been each year written off at least 5 per cent for depreciation; but that, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, is one of the evils of the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, let me right there ask the Senator to state what, in his opinion, is the actual value of that ship as of the date when the levy is to be made for taxes?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I would have to take into consideration more than the mere fact of what the boat could be sold for to-day. I would have to consider how long the present war conditions will continue. I should have to take into consideration what the owners could sell the boat for after the war closed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But suppose the Senator from Utah was levying the tax under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama, what would be the actual value of that property?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, whatever the owners could sell it for to-day; perhaps $2,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah has stated the effect of the Bankhead amendment and its operation in regard to this boat. What would be the effect and what would be the result under the amendment now proposed by the committee?

Mr. SMOOT. The basis of the exemption would be the rate of interest on the amount of cash that the owners paid for the boat. The Senator from Alabama's definition of capital, among other enumerations, states: First, "actual cash"; and, second, "the actual value of all assets other than cash." Now, note the difference of the definition of the committee: First, "actual cash paid in"; second, "the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash for stocks or shares in such corporations or partnerships at the time of such payment."

Mr. BORAH. How much tax would the committee amendment get out of it?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean out of the excess profits?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. We would get a tax on whatever increased profit the company made out of the boat, first allowing an exemption of 6 per cent or 10 per cent, as the case might be, during the year 1917 as compared to the prewar period on a valuation of $300,000; but under the Bankhead amendment there would be an exemption of 8 per cent on $2,500,000. The exemption under the committee amendment in case of 6 per cent would be $18,000, or if 10 per cent the maximum percentage allowed the amount would be $30,000, while the exemption under the Bankhead amendment would be 8 per cent on $2,500,000, or $200,000, and the Government would lose the taxes upon the difference.

Now, let me call attention to the condition that will arise, not alone in the cases to which I propose to call the attention of the Senate but in thousands of cases throughout the United States. Take the New York Central Railroad. The New York Central Railroad has a capital stock of $249,590,460; its bonded indebtedness is $679,263,153; its surplus is $49,844,023; the total of the capital stock, bonded indebtedness, and surplus of the New York Central Railroad is $978,697,623.

Now, note the Pennsylvania Railroad. The capital stock of the Pennsylvania Railroad is $506,519,948; its bonded indebtedness is only $256,308,824; its surplus is $29,541,831, or a total of capital stock, bonded indebtedness, and surplus of $792,370,603.

The capital stock and surplus of the New York Central Railroad, on which they would be allowed the exemption percentage, is $299,434,483, while the capital stock and surplus of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. is $536,061,779, or nearly twice as much, and yet the bonded indebtedness of the New York Central Railroad is $423,000,000 more than the Pennsylvania Railroad. Now, when we come to consider the exemption to each of them, what do we find? Under the committee amendment will be imposed a tax on the percentage of increase in the profits, whereas the amendment of the Senator from Alabama imposes a tax based on the percentage of profits to the capital stock and surplus, and in the case of one company those two items amount to $299,000,000, while in the case of the other company they amount to $536,000,000. The policy of the Pennsylvania Co. is to secure its working capital largely by sale of stock, while the New York Central secures most of its money by the issuing of bonds.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all.

Mr. GRONNA. I am very much interested in the Senator's statement, but I can not agree with him in the illustration he has given as to the ship. I think the Senator sets up a false standard and assumes that the Government would put the cost price upon the ship according to the profits made and not in accordance with the real value or the cost of the ship.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this very case went before arbitrators, and it was decided that the value of the ship, based upon earning capacity, was $2,000,000. Under the Bankhead amendment why should the owners of the ship not claim that amount, and should they not have it as a basis for exemption? I say to the Senator that the Government of the United States—and I think the Senator voted for the provision I have in mind—has agreed to pay for all the English ships that are now being constructed in yards in the United States $185 a ton, together with all the expense incident to hurrying up the work of construction on them; and the Senator knows that in the prewar period similar ships could have been built in the United States for $50 a ton. The Government itself has said that they will pay that rate per ton based upon present value, and we have made an appropriation to pay at the rate of practically $200 per ton for the 1,024 tons of English ships in the yards of the United States.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me further, if those who administer the affairs of this Government see fit to do an injustice to the people of the country and allow a condition such as the Senator has illustrated, I think it is time that the country knew it. I do not think that a transaction like that can be justified. I do not believe that any Government official has either the moral or the legal right to allow as a payment for insurance—which, of course, this would be—an increase of around 300 or 400 per cent in the case the Senator has cited. There is a way of finding out real cost even in war times, I will say to the Senator, and because certain Government officials have seen fit to disregard the spirit of the law and to disregard the interests of the people and in a single case have allowed abnormal prices there is no reason why we can not in this bill say what the cost shall be. We have a perfect right, if the Senator will permit me, to prescribe rules that will say what the standards shall be in fixing the cost.

Mr. SMOOT. The trouble with the Senator's position is that he ought to criticize Congress and not the Secretary of the Treasury. I stood upon the floor of the Senate and I called attention to this very thing when the appropriation bill was being considered, and I asked Senators not to vote for that provision of the bill, and there were eight votes for it, as I remember.

Further answering the Senator, he says that there is a way to find the actual value of the capital stock and surplus of all corporations—

Mr. GRONNA. The actual cost.

Mr. SMOOT. The actual cost. Why, Mr. President, we have spent now about $6,000,000 to find the actual cost of the railroads of the country. That is for one class of industry alone.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it has taken six years to do what has been done thus far.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and we are not half through. It will be another five or six years before the work is completed, and when it is completed it will not be worth 3 cents. It is a physical impossibility to secure such information of all the corporations of the country. There are not enough Democrats in all the United States out of office that can be employed to ascertain the present cost of the different industrial concerns of this country in time to impose a tax for the fiscal year 1918. They can not be found.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It might be possible to get a few Republicans to assist.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator believe that there is anything in the law which he criticizes and which was passed by Congress which would warrant the fixing of an abnormal or false price?

Mr. SMOOT. No, I will say; nor is that the question. The amendment is offered for the very purpose of compelling the ascertainment of the actual value of to-day and to base the exemption upon that value, and not what was paid for the property at the time of its purchase.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But the Senator was complaining about the ships now under construction. Most of the contracts for those ships were let before the United States entered the war at all.

Mr. SMOOT. All of them were.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They were let by Norwegians; they were let by the British; and those contracts could not be set aside. We are powerless to pass any law that would nullify that right of contract. Therefore we are bound to pay whatever price was named in the instrument, and we have taken over these Norwegian and British ships at the price which they agreed to pay for them.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; but the Senator called attention to a specific ship which cost $300,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That was years ago.

Mr. GRONNA. And he is assuming that we would have a right to say that the actual value of that ship would be $2,000,000 because it earned a dividend upon $2,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator what is the value of that ship to-day if it pays 8 per cent on $2,000,000?

Mr. GRONNA. I was referring to the cost of the ship, not to its value.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Nothing is said in the Bankhead amendment about the cost.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not what is wanted in that amendment; that is what I am complaining of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That amendment says "actual value."

Mr. GRONNA. I am not defending the proposition; I am simply trying to find out whether a false value can be given.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may pursue this inquiry just a little further, I want to get the Senator's construction of this language. The language of the committee's amendment is this:

but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Trying to apply this language to the illustration which the Senator gave of the ship—

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will turn to section 207 he will find there a definition of "capital," and I will say to the Senator—

Mr. POMERENE. My question is not directed to that branch of the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought it was.

Mr. POMERENE. It is this: The Senator's statement was that these shipowners had paid $300,000 for this vessel. The Senator did not state what the actual value of the vessel was. For aught that appears the vessel may have been worth $1,000,000, and they may have gotten it at a forced sale.

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; such was not the case.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that such is the case. Suppose that the actual value of that vessel was $1,000,000 and not $300,000—they may have been fortunate in making the purchase. If the actual value of the ship was $1,000,000—that is, if experts would agree that that vessel was fairly worth $1,000,000 in the market, that the actual money invested in it was $1,000,000, and that value was represented by its then condition—what exemption would the Senator make upon that valuation under this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the Senate committee amendment, if the purchasers paid for it in cash or its equivalent a million dollars, then they would have the right of exemption based on that amount; but in this case the ship was built by the company; it cost them $300,000; that is all they paid for it; that is all the stockholders put into the company for the stock which they received; and under the Senate committee amendment they would only be entitled to the actual cash paid in as a basis of exemption.

Mr. POMERENE. I think now I understand the Senator; but to make it a little clearer, if possible, suppose, as a matter of fact, that somebody had this vessel, that it cost him $300,000, and that he donated it to the company?

Mr. SMOOT. If it was donated to the company, Mr. President, they would have no right whatever to claim an exemption on its present value. They would only have the right to claim exemption if they paid for it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if that is the construction you place on the language, then the language ought to be changed, because they have got $300,000 of actual property, actual invested capital; and it makes no difference, in my judgment, whether it was given to them as a present or what the circumstances may have been; they ought to be entitled to some exemption based upon their actual investment.

Mr. SMOOT. They had no invested capital in the ship.

Mr. POMERENE. Why, they certainly have.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. If it was given to them they did not have any.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if the Senator were to give to his son a farm, and a deed to it in fee simple, he would not have any actual investment?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; he would. Mr. President, of course there would not be a plan presented but some one can suppose a case and make it appear as though an injustice were being done.

There is nobody running around this country, giving ships to corporations. I do not think there ever would be such a case as suggested by the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. SMOOT. Any question that the Senator desires.

Mr. POMERENE. This is a hypothetical question, but I ask it because I am interested in knowing the meaning which the Senator gives to this language.

I do not vouch for the facts, but I have in mind a statement which was made to me some time ago, that a very prominent publisher gave as a wedding present to a member of his family the right to all the proceeds derived from one page of advertising in the journal published by him, and I have been told that that advertising usually costs the advertiser $5,000 or $6,000 per issue. Now this beneficiary, of course, has the title to that page. It is worth a given amount of money. If that privilege were to be sold to the Senator from Utah, I should say he would have to pay a pretty substantial sum for it. Now, it has cost this beneficiary nothing at all, but the beneficiary gets from it an income averaging, we will say, $5,000 per week. Would the Senator say that that beneficiary was not entitled to any exemption under this language?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, in the case submitted by the Senator the beneficiary would not be taxed upon the $6,000 that the company received per week for the page of advertising. I think I know the company to which the Senator has reference, because I think there is only one company that can charge and get $6,000 per week per page for advertisements, and that is the Curtis Publishing Co. The Curtis Publishing Co., in making their annual return to the Treasury Department, would have to include the amount received for advertising, including that one page, like all other receipts of the Curtis Publishing Co., and the excess-profits tax is collected from the company. If the company wants to give it to some particular individual, it then becomes the income of that individual; and when the individual receives the $6,000 a week, she or he, as the case may be, has to report to the Treasury Department the amount as income and it is taxed under the income-tax provision of this bill. So the company does not escape the excess-profits tax and the individual does not escape the income tax; but the gift, Mr. President, is just the same as any other receipt of the company as far as the excess-profits tax is concerned.

Mr. President, I hope we can take a vote upon this amendment to-night, unless somebody else wants to speak upon it. There are a good many other things that I could say to-night on the amendment offered by the Senator from California, and also on the amendments of the Senator from Alabama; but I trust I have already said enough to convince the Senators that if either one of the amendments is adopted there will be a grave injustice done to the industries of this country; and I am not only convinced that there will be a grave injustice done, but I believe with all my heart that if the Johnson amendment is adopted it will be the means of ultimately causing bankruptcy to many, many industries of this country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator has given us a great many figures and tables. I should like to ask the Senator if the expert of the Finance Committee made the figures and tables he has been giving the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean the ones that I gave yesterday?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I mean the ones from which the Senator has been quoting to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. The figures that I have given to-day are mine. I have taken the figures of the railroad companies from Moody's Analysis of Railroad Investments.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am talking about the estimates as a result of the figures.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not have to ask anyone for the results of the figures. I can figure those results just as well as any expert that ever lived. I am responsible for them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is what I want to know, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT. And I am ready to defend them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Of course the Senator is.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is first in order for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes; the question is upon the amendment of the Senator from California.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to ask the Senator from California whether his amendment simply involves a change of the 55 per cent proposed by the committee to 73 per cent? Is that the only change from the committee amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, Mr. President. The amendment that has been offered by me makes a flat levy upon war profits of 73 per cent. It is the intention to follow this amendment, if it be successful, with such appropriate amendment as will compute the war profits under the system adopted by the Finance Committee after its two months of deliberation.

Mr. THOMPSON. The amendment of the Senator from California does not change the process recommended by the committee of arriving at the war profits?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Not as originally presented. It does not accept the mode that is now presented by the amendment of the Finance Committee.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope the Senator will not do that. It will be useless, because the Senators who are busy would go back to the matters that interest them more; and I really ask him not to make the point. It would use up time and would not amount to anything.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I withdraw the request, then.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, we have reached a point in the discussion of the bill where votes are going to mean hundreds of millions of dollars. It is more necessary that the minds of the Senators should meet, so that they will vote intelligently on the problem, than it is that some special Senator or group of Senators should have his or their own way about it.

In order that the Senate may have in mind certain definite facts, I will put in the Record at this time just what the bill as reported from the committee undertook to do.

In the first place, the bill as reported repeals the munitions tax under Title III of the act of September 8, 1916, and it also repeals the excess-profits tax under Title II of the act of March 3, 1917. The bill as reported, and as it now stands, also levies a tax of 4 per cent on the income of corporations, in addition to the 2 per cent levied on the income of corporations under section 10 of the act of September 8, 1916. The bill as reported also levies a graduated war-profits tax of from 12 per cent to 50 per cent on the war profits of corporations. The Senate, by a separate amendment lately reported, has increased the graduated scale to a maximum of 60 per cent on the largest war profits, and has also changed the method of computing the war profits. The original Jones amendment would tax the undivided profits of corporations 15 per cent. The committee bill as reported would tax these undivided profits 10 per cent under certain specified circumstances.

The only other Federal tax on corporations is a small tax on capital stock, 50 cents on each $1,000 of capital. That tax is imposed under section 407 of the act of September 8, 1916.

On page 23 of the majority report it is stated that the new war-income tax, as the bill was originally reported, would produce $777,700,000. This is on the basis of last year's income. Of this amount, $417,000,000 is estimated to accrue from individual income taxes under the bill, and $360,000,000 is estimated to accrue from the 4 per cent income tax levied against corporations. Since the bill was originally reported by the committee other amendments have been adopted, including the Gerry amendment, which adds about $40,000,000 extra income tax, and the Lenroot amendments, which add about $20,000,000. I figure the amount myself at $17,000,000. The expert makes it somewhat larger.

On page 23 of the majority report the war-profits tax under the bill as originally reported is estimated to produce $562,000,000. The amount is figured on war profits for this year the same as last year, substantially $3,000,000,000, producing $788,000,000, an average of about 26 per cent, under the war-profits tax as originally reported. From the $788,000,000 produced by this war-profits tax there is deducted in the committee statement $226,000,000, being the proceeds of the existing excess-profits tax. To that there ought to be added something for the existing munitions tax, but the existing munitions tax has produced so little that the committee has evidently disregarded it.

It is suggested that the war profits for the present year will be largely decreased, because corporations will be allowed to deduct from their war profits dividends from corporations whose stock they own when such corporations have already paid war profits or income taxes.

The bill as originally reported by the committee was a scientific bill, based on philosophical lines. It undertook, in the first place, to increase largely the income taxes on individuals. It did not undertake to increase largely the tax on the incomes of corporations as income. As a concession to those who thought corporations should pay larger income taxes, it did increase the additional levy on the incomes of corporations by 2 per cent over the House bill.

The committee undertook to levy a war-profits tax, and I think it undertook to do that properly, because it is the theory that what an individual makes out of the misfortunes of the Nation he holds in his hands very much as a trust fund for the benefit of the Nation. It was not intended by the committee that a man who makes large profits out of the war itself should be allowed to retain a very large part of that war profit for his own benefit.

My own theory of the war-profits tax is that the person who makes a war profit out of the misfortunes of the Nation should be a trustee and should be treated as a mere collection agency for gathering into a pile those war profits, so that the Nation may take them for the public good. I myself would allow that person or corporation a good, fair percentage for collecting the money for the Nation. I should allow him 10 or 20 per cent. But that is the extreme view.

The committee proceeded in the first place to handle war profits on a scientific basis and on the easiest basis for computing war profits, because it needs no argument to the Senate to explain how extremely difficult it is to reckon the actual capital invested or what the actual assets of a corporation are worth to-day. We have had that matter discussed for several days. It is almost impossible to do it. It will take an enormous force of clerks, and the results will not be accurate or satisfactory. Therefore the committee proposed that it would say nothing about capital stock; it would ascertain from returns now on file with the Treasury Department how much the profits were that were made by the corporation in the three years preceding the war—that is, the three years preceding January 1, 1914—that an average should be taken for those years, and that that average should be considered the normal profits of a corporation not affected by war conditions.

That measure of reaching the prewar profits was nothing but a test, a method of ascertainment, a method of proof. We would all agree that if we could ascertain accurately in dollars and cents, without too much expense, just what the profits are that are due to the war we would take a very large percentage of them, and then we would disagree on just what the percentage should be; but it is absolutely impossible to find out just how much of a corporation's profits are due to war conditions, and the committee took the only satisfactory method that has been suggested of finding that out.

I myself was entirely satisfied with the committee's method of reaching the war profits, but another idea was forced upon the committee. The committee has been driven from its philosophical attitude on this bill by the clamor of the country and the clamor of a majority of the Senate. The Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Ohio early in the discussion drew attention to the fact that if you reckoned your war profits solely on the basis of the difference between what the corporation earned before the war and what the corporation earned during the year that is to be taxed you would levy a large tax on some prosperous corporations and levy no tax upon other prosperous corporations. That is an argument that appeals to most men; but it ought not to appeal to any man, and I think I can demonstrate why it ought not.

Take the case of a corporation with a capital of $1,000,000, earning $1,000,000, or 100 per cent, before the war, and assume that that corporation continues to earn $1,000,000 each year, 100 per cent, since the war began. You can not ascribe any of those earnings to war profits. You have no reason to think they come from war profits. That is its normal income. You have no right to tax that corporation for making war profits, because you are not able to prove that it is making a dollar of war profits.

Take another corporation with a million dollars capital, making $100,000 a year, or 10 per cent, before the war. Then assume that during the war that corporation is making 50 per cent, or half a million dollars a year. It is easy to see that $400,000 of that profit may be fairly called war products. The evidence adduced indicates that that is war profits. Now, in my estimation, we would be justified in taking practically all of that $400,000 because it is due to the war, whereas we would not be entitled to take any of the million-dollar profit of the other corporation because none of it is due to the war. That is the only philosophical way to handle this problem.

There is another principle involved that we ought to consider. The income tax is levied on individuals, and properly should be levied on individuals alone, because the theory of the income tax is that a man is taxed in accordance with his capacity for enjoying what he has. If he has $1,000 a year, he can enjoy $1,000. If he has $100,000 a year, he can enjoy $100,000. A corporation can not enjoy anything. It has nothing to enjoy with. It has no senses. It not only has no soul, but it has no feeling, and it ought not to have. It is a pure money-making institution. Therefore the income of a corporation never ought to be taxed as income. The profits of a corporation should be driven into the hands of the stockholders, and there they should be taxed as income of individuals, and that is easily demonstrated.

Under our income tax as applied, we put a higher rate on large incomes than we do on small incomes. That is because the taxes when applied are imposed in proportion to the ability to pay—first, the ability to enjoy; second, the ability to pay. Now, a man may have only four or five thousand dollars, and he may have it all invested in the stock of one corporation, say the United States Steel Corporation. When he gets his income—call it 6 per cent on $5,000, $300 a year—he has not got any income that you want to tax in his hands. His income is not big enough so that it should be taxed. But if you put the tax on the corporation as an income tax, you take it out of the small stockholder just the same as you take it out of the very largest stockholder.

That is not a fair basis for taxing income. Therefore the only fair way to treat an income tax is to put it only on individuals, but to compel the corporation to declare its earnings in dividends, so that you can reach it in the hands of individuals. It is double taxation if you do it in any other way.

Under the terms of this bill as reported, it is provided that not only any corporation in business, but any individual in business, shall pay a war-profits tax. If it is a war-profits tax, I have no quarrel with it; but if it is an income tax, you tax that individual double. The man who invests his $100,000 in business and makes a profit on it is doing some good to the community; but you penalize him by charging him an income tax on the money that he has invested. You tax him on the income he makes out of his business, and then you turn around and tax him on the same money as the income of the individual; whereas the man who has $100,000 and buys Government bonds, tax exempt, does no good to the community and he is taxed only once on his income.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to ask the Senator a question in order to get his theory clearly in my mind.

I understood the Senator to say that if a corporation made $1,000,000 or any other given sum before the war, and made $1,000,000 after the war, it should not be taxed at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. As war profits.

Mr. KNOX. As war profits?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. The question I want the Senator to answer me, if he will, is this: Is it the mere fact that the profits are made subsequent to the war that determines whether they are war profits or not?

For instance, suppose a corporation made $1,000,000 before the war and made a million and a half after the war, but the additional $500,000 could be clearly traced to a simplification of process, or something of that kind, with which the war had no relation—would that be taxed as war profits?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to answer the Senator. In my judgment it would. That is not because philosophically and equitably it ought to be, but it is because we have not, under our human institutions and with our human imperfections, any other way to get at it. There is no way in which anyone can tell, at the greatest amount of expense, just what, in every business of this country, might be ascribed to the war. It is an impossible task. We are obliged to invent and apply some rule that will work generally.

The Senator postulates that this $500,000 of extra profits were made from an improvement in process. My reply to that is that the Senator can not tell whether it was made in that way or not. He might think so. The Senator from Utah might think otherwise.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I can recall instances where a manufacturing establishment, for instance, is putting out a certain amount of tonnage per annum. A simple invention sometimes will reduce the cost of that product 50 cents or a dollar a ton, and it is just a plain mathematical proposition that the profits are increased that much.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is perfectly true, and that case would be so plain that a jury sitting on it would unanimously arrive at that result. That would shade into another case that would not be so clear, and then you would get into the dark places that were talked about by the Senator from Alabama. Now, we can not run this war on too scientific or too meticulous a basis. We can not refine it too much. We have got to make broad, general lines. We can not be too easygoing. We can not be too delicate. It would seem to me that the original committee plan was the only sound one. It would not work exact justice in all cases. We do not have to work exact justice in every case. All we are obliged to do is to have our laws uniform. That was a uniform rule, and I believe it would work.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I should like to follow the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania a little further with another question.

Let us suppose that we have one company manufacturing household goods and supplies, with an investment of $100,000 and that during the prewar period they made a net profit of 20 per cent on their stock.

Then let us suppose that during the current year that same company, through its purchasing agent, has been able to anticipate the market price of raw materials to such an extent that it was able to make 30 per cent on its capital stock during the current year. Now, let us take that as one example. Then let us take another corporation with identically the same capital stock, with identically the same earnings before the war, but their purchasing agent was not able to anticipate the market as well as the purchasing agent in the first instance, and by reason of that fact they made only 10 per cent. Would you say that the company which made 30 per cent would be obliged to attribute that excess of 10 per cent profit to war conditions?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; I should not. I would not undertake, as I said in reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania, to attribute it. I should not undertake to work justice down to the last percentage, because it would be impossible. I should say the only measure we have for war profits is how much more do you make than you did before the war. Now, opinions may differ as to what the increase may be ascribed to, and I would not go into that. I would not have the Treasury Department undertake to go into it. I would say this rule does not work exact justice, but it is the only possible rule to have, and we will apply it uniformly and as honestly as we can, and in that way we will find out where we are, we will get our taxes levied and we will have two or three billion dollars extra to pay our bills with.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the course of the debate has indicated to Senators, it certainly has to my mind, that the original proposition of the Senate committee was very unjust in that it would often exempt enormous earnings from any tax at all, and the Senate committee apparently perceived that position, because they come in now and say that the exemption shall be limited to a certain percentage of earnings of the capital stock, not less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent. Why would not a straight tax of 6 or 7 or 8 or 9 or 10 per cent work for greater justice than the present plan, with the latitude which is given to the Treasury Department between the two extremes of 6 and 10 per cent?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because what the Senator suggests is not a war-profits tax at all. It is a straight income tax on corporations, and that I want to discuss further. I do not believe in an income tax on corporations. I have suggested already why the same capital should not be taxed twice, why the same income should not be taxed twice.

Now, take the case of a corporation where all the stock is owned by one stockholder—there are many such—or where all the stock is owned by a single family. The stock is invested in a corporation. The corporation makes a profit. You impose an income tax on the corporation, and you reduce the profits just so much. Then when the dividends are declared and the income goes into the hands of the individuals you tax it again, and you have taxed that same capital on its income twice.

Now, if you want to pursue that plan, the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is the one that you want. I have not believed in that. I believe if you are going to impose an income tax you ought to impose it when it reaches the individual. Then you will get a fair measure of the amount of enjoyment that it will produce to the individual, because, as I have already explained, it will produce no enjoyment to the corporation and can not until it gets out of the corporation.

If the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is adopted, we are putting two income taxes, two straight income taxes, on corporations. We are putting a 6 per cent straight income tax on all corporations and then we are putting on their income, not on their capital, another graduated income tax with an exemption at the bottom on the same corporation. Now, those ought to be put together. They ought to be unified and they ought to be put on some proper basis.

I am opposed to the suggestion from the Senator from Ohio and to the Bankhead amendment, because they assume to be war-profit taxes and they are not war-profit taxes. They are nothing but straight income taxes.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to take a little exception to a construction which might be placed upon the Senator's language. His statement is that we assume to be placing a tax on war profits. I recognize the fact that there has been a good deal of discussion on the subject of war profits and what they are, but I have not seen or heard any definition of war profits that satisfies my mind. Profits are profits to me; I am quite willing to call all profits war profits which are gained during the period of the war, if it is necessary to characterize them at all. I think that whether they are directly attributed to the war or not, they all ought to be taxed, and I am more convinced of that because of the fact that it is utterly impossible to say what are war profits and what are not war profits. My good friend the Senator from New Hampshire has admitted the extreme difficulty in some of the illustrations which were called to his attention.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if we wait until we get an absolutely philosophical, symmetrical, unimpeachable war-revenue bill, we will wait a great many years and the war will be past many years. It can not be done. We must each apply his own intelligence to the problem and reach his own result. I think the majority will reach as fair a result as can be reached.

Now, then, the Senator from Ohio is in favor of imposing a large graduated income tax on corporations, and if an amendment is offered to that effect we can meet it when it comes; but I wish to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that that is precisely what the Bankhead amendment is, a graduated income tax on corporations. It pays no attention whatever to war profits. The recent committee amendment does pay some attention to the war-profits end of it, but not as much as I think should be paid to it. It provides that no corporation shall be allowed an exemption of more than 10 per cent on its capital actually invested, and no corporation may be allowed an exemption of less than 6 per cent on its capital actually invested. That gives some flexibility. That will pay some attention to the amount of war profits that are made; that is, between 6 per cent and 10 per cent. For myself, I do not think there is enough flexibility there so that the war-profits condition is adequately recognized.

Now, what I have been coming to is this, that if the present plan of the Senate committee is adhered to and the exemption allowed is from 6 to 10 per cent, then the amendment offered by the Senator from California puts altogether too high a figure; that is, if there is only 10 per cent exemption, then he has got a flat income tax above that 73 per cent, and that is altogether too much when we consider how much we have on personal incomes. But I do not understand that that is the idea of the Senator from California. The Senator from California believes that the Senate will go back to the original method of computing war profits, and if that is done then I will gladly vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from California. I shall vote for it in the first instance because I believe it will be followed by amendments which will place us back on the committee war-profits exemption basis; and that is the reason why I shall vote for it, and the only reason.

Now I wish to state my own personal theory of the way this tax should be raised. I believe, in the first place, that we ought to raise $3,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Before the Senator leaves the subject he has been discussing, do I understand him aright that he believes there ought to be a flat tax of 80 per cent imposed, notwithstanding the fact that we have an income tax that is higher than that of any two countries in the world?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that, and I want to amplify it. In my judgment, war profits have no connection at all with an income tax. The war profits, if we have a reasonable rule for ascertaining them, are what are made out of the misfortunes of the Nation and are a fund in the hands of those who make them, and the Nation should reach out without compunction and take them to itself; that is war profits.

Now, on an income tax you reach the income that comes into the individual's hands for his private enjoyment, and we have put a large income tax on those fortunes. I have entirely separated them. My criticism of the committee's present attitude is that they have mixed them up. They have conceded too much to the idea of those who believe in a graduated income tax on corporations. I believe that at the outset we ought to raise

I believe the committee has practically conceded that, and I do not wish to criticize the committee. I believe this committee has done splendidly. I think the committee has recommended a philosophical bill; that it has acted honestly and with great intelligence; and knowing the committee as I have known it for four years, I want to compliment them on their wonderful advance along progressive lines. I do not know to what to ascribe it, but I hope it is partly to what they have heard on the floor of the Senate. They will probably deny that.

Under the income tax we ought to raise a billion dollars and we can do it. The committee estimates that corporation income taxes at 4 per cent will produce $360,000,000. Under the amendment that I have offered we will raise $557,000,000 from individual income taxes. The amendment that I have offered takes the beginning of the committee amendment and it takes the ending of the committee amendment as changed by the Gerry amendment. It thickens up the income tax on fortunes between $25,000 and $750,000. It is no use to argue to me about poor people who have an income of $25,000. When you get to $25,000 my amendment gradually increases until at $100,000 the percentage is nearly twice as much as that of the committee. Then the difference gradually fades away until $750,000 is reached, which is the same. It makes the committee amendment as amended much more systematic than it is at present.

The war profits as reckoned by the committee at the outset are $3,000,000,000. I have not heard anyone estimate what the war profits will be this year if the present committee system of ascertaining war profits is adopted. Has the Senator from Utah figured it so as to give it in round numbers?

Mr. SMOOT. You mean based upon the amount—

Mr. HOLLIS. The present committee amendment provides that the war profits shall be ascertained by deducting not more than 10 per cent on the capital invested and not less than 6 per cent on the capital invested from the profits. Has anyone reckoned how much that will be?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be a little over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. That will be $4,000,000,000, and if the tax is raised the amount raised is $1,300,000,000. That would be somewhere about 30 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the exact percentage of the amount is thirty-one and a little over one-half, about five-eighths.

Mr. HOLLIS. Now, if you go back to the original estimate of the committee—$3,000,000,000—the 73 per cent suggested by the Senator from California will produce $2,200,000,000. Then if we add to that the $207,000,000 from spirits, which cuts out the soda-fountain drinks altogether—for I do not believe the Senate will impose that tax—and the $56,000,000 to be raised from tobacco, there will be raised under the bill $3,380,000,000, and I believe as much as that should be raised. That takes no account of the consumption tax on tea, coffee, sugar, cocoa, and so on. I believe if we raise as much as is now proposed from incomes and from war profits and whisky and tobacco we ought not to raise anything under this bill in consumption taxes. So you would have $3,380,000,000 if the amendment of the Senator from California is adopted, and if the amendment offered by the Senator from California is not adopted, and if we do go back to the original method of estimating war profits, I shall myself offer an amendment for a flat rate of 50 per cent. I believe in a flat rate for this reason. It is all right in an income tax to have a graduated scale. It is all right to tax a man with an income of $5,000, 2 per cent, and a man with an income of $50,000, 10 per cent, because that is in proportion to the ability of each to pay. But when you come to war profits you have nothing to do with the ability to pay. The corporation or the individual that has war profits has got something that does not belong to it or to him; it is something that belongs to the Nation; and there is no reason for imposing a graduated tax. We should take it all, allowing 10 or 20 or 30 per cent for collection. I can not see any reason for applying a graduated tax to war profits.

I thought that at this time I would put these figures in the Record and explain where we are coming out if the different amendments are adopted. I am willing to yield the floor now.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him if he does not think a better system and an easier plan for raising this revenue would be to get out of mind the question of war profits or excess profits and levy a tax upon profits, it makes no difference from what source they come, and graduate it, and when you reach a certain per cent you know in what war zone you are.

The amendment that I have proposed up to and including 5 per cent of the income is 5 per cent; 5 per cent to and including 10 per cent, 10 per cent; 10 per cent to and including 15 per cent, 25 per cent. Now, then, you have reached the war profits. Then the next bracket from 15 per cent up to and including 20 per cent, 50 per cent. There you are levying a tax of 50 per cent upon war profits, and, as you know, when a man is making 50 per cent you can charge him war profits. Above 20 per cent it is 75 per cent. Now, it is perfectly easy to understand when that rate is applied what your object is and that you succeed in taxing war profits. It seems to me that that is an easier plan than to simply take a flat rate upon profits that have been earned by corporations and individuals. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad to express my views.

In the first place, when the Senator talks about a tax on the profits of corporations or the profits of business—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am talking about every character and source of business, whether it is corporate or individual or a partnership. Whenever they have earned profits above a certain amount I assume that we may properly charge them to the war and call them war profits; and when they reach that point I favor taxing them highly.

Mr. HOLLIS. Precisely. The Senator is talking about the profits upon any business.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. That means the income of those engaged in the business, whether they are corporations or partnerships or individuals. That is nothing but an income tax on business, and I have already explained that I am opposed to having an income tax on business, and then an income tax on the individuals engaged in the business, for when you take a large percentage out of the income of the business you are taking that large percentage out of the small stockholder, who does not get enough income out of the business so that he ought to be charged any income tax at all. That is not philosophical; it can not be made right. It may be necessary to do some such injustice as that in this emergency, but I do not believe it.

The Senator asks whether it is not easier and simpler to levy the tax on all above a certain percentage of the capital. Whether it is the capital now invested or the capital already paid in, I will not pause to inquire; but I say to the Senator that that is an extremely difficult way to do it. If you put it merely on the excess profits—that is, the profits above the prewar profits—then you avoid the necessity of finding out what the capital invested is in making your computation. By far the easiest way to do it is not to consider the capital invested at all. I believe that is what moved the committee in the first place, and I believe the committee was exactly right. I believe the committee has yielded on this point merely because there has been such a clamor over the country, and there was such a wave sweeping over the Senate that the committee believed the Senate wanted it that way. I believe, if so, the Senate is mistaken, and on reflection will go back to the original idea.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest to the Senator that perhaps another thing also influenced the committee, and perhaps he would be glad to discuss it, namely, the great difficulty of really determining whether the differences in the business of companies and partnerships as shown three years before the war and as shown now were really due to the war.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have no doubt that also influenced the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. A study of the particular lines of business led us to the conclusion that we could not really claim that these profits were war profits, but that rather in many cases there were peculiar conditions three years before the war which affected profits then. It was extremely difficult to really reach the conclusion that we were dealing with war profits or to fix any plan by which we could be sure we were simply dealing with war profits. I wish to say to the Senator for myself that was the great trouble.

In studying the particular lines of business, I was forced to the conclusion that the difference in their profits was often not due in any way to war, and if we took them at the rate of 50 or 60 or 75 per cent we would not be taking from what they made by the war. For one, if I could just know we were dealing with just what the war added to business. I should like to see it used to pay the expenses of the war; but in studying special companies and in making a very extended examination I was forced to the conclusion that it was almost impossible to be at all sure that that was true.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am afraid the distinguished Senator from Georgia—we all know his kind heart—was a little too tender toward people making large profits.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire is mistaken about that. I did not feel tender about using to conduct the war profits made from the war. My tenderness does not go in that direction.

Mr. HOLLIS. I did not mean at all that the Senator leaned toward the predatory wealth end of it; I know he did not not; but I think that he tried a little too hard to be perfectly just. We can not win this war if we are going to be squeamish; we have got to be tough-fibered; we have got to go through to the end. We have got to lay down general principles and stick to them. What the Senator says is a most excellent illustration of the adage known to every lawyer, that hard cases make poor law. You can not lay down a method of taxation without finding 10,000 cases where it impinges, as it seems, unjustly. If your rule is uniform you need not bother about the injustice of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN in the chair). Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I dislike to refer to local conditions when it comes to discussing general legislative propositions, but the Senator from New Hampshire seems to be infatuated with the idea that war profits is a matter easily definable, and so forth. That is where I differ from him. Now, let me give the Senator this illustration from my own State. In order to determine what are normal profits to be exempted from taxation the committee has chosen the years 1911, 1912, and 1913. It so happens that the year 1913 was the year of the great flood in Ohio and Indiana. There was not a railroad company nor an interurban company nor a public utilities company within the State, and there were very few industrial companies, that did not have their profits, if not a part of their capital invested, largely wiped out that year; yet when it comes to determining what are the average profits of those three years we are to call them normal years, though one year was extremely subnormal. Then those three years are averaged. So under this so-called war-profits tax every business institution in the State of Ohio is penalized because we had a flood.

I refer to that not that I am expecting any relief because of that fact for any institution in Ohio but I refer to it as a circumstance to indicate the absolute injustice of attempting to base present exemptions upon what may have been industrial conditions during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Ohio illustrate what I have just stated about hard cases making poor law. Indiana and Ohio are part of a great country; they are part of a great country that is engaged in waging war. Ohio and Indiana are not going to ask any special laws made for their particular benefit, I am sure; but if they do ask for it, let us meet the matter man fashion and adjust it in a fair way that will apply to all the country. This suggestion occurs to me: If it is a fact that over a substantial part of the country in any one of these three prewar years unfortunate conditions prevailed, so that profits were very much lower than they were in other years, then allow the taxpayer to select two of those three years and let the average of those two years be the basis. I would vote for that, and I do not know but that would be an improvement.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HOLLIS. I do.

Mr. NEW. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to the fact that I have introduced an amendment of that character, which will be presented at the proper time, providing that the business may select two of those three years.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am very glad that the Senator from Indiana has done so, because there is a great deal to be said for that plan. It would work greater justice, perhaps, if it were adopted; but the difficulties of imposing a good system ought not to frighten us. We should impose the kind of a system which we think is best. If it bears a little heavily on our part of the country, let us think of Belgium and Serbia and other parts of the earth where things are bearing much more heavily than they do on us. I believe that if the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is adopted, and if we go back to the original method of ascertaining war profits, we shall reach a just and a sound result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, if it is desired to have a vote on this amendment, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	McKellar	Simmons
Bankhead	Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Mich.
Brandeggee	Husting	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	James	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Stone
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Sutherland
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Thompson
Fall	Kendrick	Polindexter	Townsend
Fernald	Kenyon	Pomerene	Underwood
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Vardaman
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Gerry	Lewis	Shafroth
Hale	Lodge	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no desire to impose a speech upon the Senate, but a number of Senators who have left their offices want to vote upon this amendment. They are not here and did not expect that there would be a vote upon it before morning. I very much dislike to have it go to a vote at this time; I so much dislike it that if a vote is forced I shall have to make a speech.

Mr. LEWIS. Then we hope the vote will be forced.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We should like to hear the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho has the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I think that it would better conserve all purposes if we could have the matter go over until the morning, because, in my judgment, there will not be over 15 or 20 minutes debate upon it in the morning.

Mr. PENROSE. It is not necessary, Mr. President, for the Senator to confine himself to the bill in his remarks.

Mr. BORAH. I should prefer to confine myself to the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BORAH. Certainly. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator from Idaho does not wish to speak this afternoon?

Mr. BORAH. "The Senator from Idaho" is not going to speak upon this particular amendment at all except for the purpose of protecting certain Senators who have gone away. It is not my intention to occupy any time in the morning upon this amendment. So I am not asking for time for myself to make a speech, but there are Senators absent who desire to be present to vote upon this amendment, and I must protect them even to the extent of making a speech which I did not intend otherwise to make at this time.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senate does not quail before the threatened infliction.

Mr. BORAH. Do not thus boast until you hear it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there may be other Senators who desire to speak on this amendment this afternoon.

Mr. BORAH. If there are any, I have no desire to interfere in any way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire if there is any Senator in the Chamber who desires to speak upon this amendment this afternoon? [A pause.]

Mr. President, what the Senator from Idaho says about the absence of Senators this afternoon is true. I am advised that probably more than 25 Senators are absent from the Chamber. I presume that condition has grown out of the idea that, as we have fixed a time to vote, probably we would not begin to vote on amendments for some little while yet. I am disposed today to ask for a recess, and then let it be known to Senators who are absent that we have not been able to reach a vote this afternoon upon an amendment when the Senate was ready to vote because they were absent from the Chamber.

Senators upon this side of the Chamber and upon the other side of the Chamber have been for several days insisting that we should take this bill up and vote upon amendments. We have taken it up, and we are practically ready to vote upon an amendment, but we are not able to do so because some 20 or 25 Senators are absent from the Chamber. So, Mr. President, if we lose the remainder of this day, it is not the fault of the Senate, but it is the fault of the absent Senators. Under the circumstances I move that the Senate take a recess.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina withhold his motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. I withhold the motion.

Mr. LODGE. I simply desire to say that I am afraid that possibly Senators have not taken notice, although I spoke about it yesterday when the agreement was being made, that under the language of the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate may vote on any amendment at any time and may vote on the bill finally at any time. We may vote on the bill finally at any time. It may not wait until a week from Monday. The vote may come at any time, and the importance of Senators being constantly here, where they can be reached for a vote, is very great indeed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Another matter of very great importance to the American people just now is the trading-with-the-enemy bill. I suggest that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] is ready to proceed with that bill and it might be considered at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under the unanimous-consent agreement that could not be done.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I thought it was understood that if a lull came in the proceedings other matters might be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair holds that the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi is not in order, as it is not in order to consider other matters during the life of the unanimous-consent agreement.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I renew my motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina moves that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m., Friday, August 31, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, September 1, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, September 1, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Lodge	Shafroth
Bankhead	Hardwick	McCumber	Sheppard
Beckham	Hitchcock	McKellar	Sherman
Brandeggee	Hollis	McNary	Simmons
Broussard	Husting	Martin	Smith, Mich.

Fernald	King	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Kirby	Polindexter	Watson
France	Knox	Pomerene	Williams
Gerry	La Follette	Robinson
Gronna	Lewis	Saulsbury

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness in his family. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. WALSH]. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that my colleague the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

THE I. W. W. MENACE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hands to the Secretary a telegram in the nature of a petition, which, at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], will be printed in the RECORD, without objection. The Chair hears no objection.

The telegram is as follows:

DRUMMOND, MONT., August 29, 1917.

The honorable Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the Government of these United States is at war with the Governments of the central powers; and
Whereas it is the duty of every American and American citizen to help, aid, and assist the Government of these United States in carrying this war with its enemies to a successful termination; and
Whereas there is a certain element of disloyal and unpatriotic people in these United States, and more especially in the Northwestern States, who are doing everything possible to hamper and impede the Government in its present war with its enemies; and
Whereas these disloyal and unpatriotic people, through their agitation and coercion, have caused the shutdown of the copper mines at Butte, Mont., and the manganese mines at Philipsburg, Mont., and the lumber industry in other parts of this State and other States and by so doing have stopped the output of copper and manganese ores and the lumber, all of which are much needed by the Government of these United States to carry to a successful termination this war with its enemies; and
Whereas a great many of these people have been known to have made insulting and seditious remarks against the Government, the President, and our soldiers and sailors in uniform; and
Whereas a great many of these people are aliens and allowed to remain at home while our own American boys and American citizens have been drafted to the colors, and thousands of them have gone voluntarily: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the undersigned officers of the Patriotic Citizens' Association of Camps Nos. 1 and 2, of Granite County, Mont., with the unanimous consent and hearty approval of our 400 members, do respectfully request that the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled do help and assist in the speedy passage of the Myers bill, an act making it unlawful for any person to make any seditious remarks against these United States or its President or Congress or soldiers or sailors, etc., and also assist in the speedy passage of Representative EVANS' bill, an act compelling all aliens of military age to either serve under their own colors or the colors of these United States.

Respectfully submitted.

R. A. HAWLEY,
President Camp No. 1.
CHAS. E. ANDERSON,
Secretary Camp No. 1.
W. E. ALBRIGHT,
President Camp No. 2.
LYLE F. WILSON,
Secretary Camp No. 2.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the Delaware Branch of the National Woman's Party, which will be printed in the RECORD, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas this our country is engaged in war; and
Whereas the President of the United States has proclaimed that we are to fight "for the things we have always carried nearest our hearts—democracy—for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own government"; and
Whereas 20,000,000 of women in these United States are not only denied a voice in their own government but those who peacefully and legally plead for it are arbitrarily and unjustly thrown into prison: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we protest against this continued injustice to women and demand their enfranchisement through the immediate passage of the Susan B. Anthony amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to President Wilson, Senators SAULSBURY and WOLCOTT and Representative POLK, asking Senator SAULSBURY and Representative POLK that they have them read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

FLORENCE BAYARD HILLES,
State Chairman.

AUGUST 28, 1917.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for a labor census and for a system of industrial conscription, etc., which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

He also presented a petition of the California State Rural Carriers' Association, pledging support to the Government in the prosecution of the war, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON:

A bill (S. 2837) for the relief of William E. Johnson; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 2838) for the relief of Lee M. Clark; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 2839) granting a pension to Ed. M. Deemer; to the Committee on Pensions.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to have the amendment read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 201 down to and including line 22, on page 13, of the committee amendment to Title II and to insert:

SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax) equal to 73 per cent of the war profits determined as hereinafter provided.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I think it is the consensus of opinion that war profits should be made to pay the cost of this war, as far as practicable; that there should be taken over for the purpose of carrying on the expenses of the war practically a very large part of these profits. I sympathize with that attitude. But, Mr. President, I also realize that it is of the highest importance in the conduct of the war that the capital employed in furnishing and expanding the production of the munitions of war should be active and vigorous and should still further expand their plants.

As I understand it, this proposed amendment would take something over 80 per cent of the war profits. I understand that the concerns engaged in the manufacture of war supplies and war munitions were encouraged prior to our entry into the war to expand their plants on a very great scale in anticipation of earning extraordinary profits during the operation of the war; that these very extensive and costly plants in greater or lesser degree at the termination of the war, which may come with more or less suddenness, might be unavailable for other purposes, might prove comparatively worthless; and that some of these concerns anticipating abnormal war profits have borrowed large amounts of money and invested them in buildings, machinery, and so forth, anticipating that they would repay such loans out of the profits. What will happen to these citizens and corporations if we do not leave them enough of the profits to meet these probable losses? What will be the effect on the activities of those supplying war supplies if he is certain of receiving only a fifth of his profits and no safeguard is put in the law to safeguard his actual capital from appropriation under the so-called excess war-profits tax?

It is impossible for one who has not attended the hearings of the committee to be thoroughly informed with regard to all these details, but I believe it to be the part of prudence not to impose the taxes to a point which would stop or greatly impair the development of the works looking to the expanding of the supplies of materials required for war or impair our future revenues from this source. I think it would be easier to enlarge the war-profits tax after we shall have determined how the committee amendment will affect these industries rather than go so far in the first imposition of these taxes that we may do a harm which would be not easily repaired. Leaving 20 per cent of the war profits in the hands of those who are engaged in these enterprises would not, I am quite sure, in some of the most important companies, leave a sufficient amount to meet the expenditure for new buildings and new machinery, which when the war ends might be unproductive and a liability instead of an asset, because taxable.

I feel very strongly disposed to take the war taxes as far as they may be taken without harm to the productive activities of the country, but I do not feel myself able to follow the proposed amendment so far. I wanted to make this brief explanation of the reason I do not find myself able to vote for this amendment to the amendment.

The proposed amendment proposes a tax on war profits "determined as hereinafter provided," and depends on a future amendment not disclosed in the pending amendment. This is an improvident and unwise method of parliamentary procedure.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, it is my design, as briefly as I can, to explain exactly what the amendment is that is now presented to the Senate, and in comparison with the amendment that has been presented by the majority of the committee to comment upon the two divergent views, that the Senate may be wholly informed, and being wholly informed may then choose the view that it desires to take in this particular crisis.

In the beginning of what, briefly, I shall say I desire to congratulate the Finance Committee not only upon its laborious and arduous task, now nearly completed, not alone upon its fidelity and its industry in the endeavor to solve the great question and the great problem presented to it, but I desire to congratulate the Finance Committee as well upon its conversion to the view that was expressed on this floor but a short week ago and upon the adoption of the principle that then was contended for by some of us and which now is embraced by the Finance Committee.

In speaking thus to you concerning the Finance Committee I speak with an admiration and a high respect for every member of that committee. I yield to the committee itself and to each individual member the highest meed of praise that can be accorded to men who conscientiously and industriously and with the most painstaking and careful research and investigation have performed a most difficult task and sought to solve a most difficult problem. But, nevertheless, within the legitimate limits of a forensic discussion, it is my right as well as the right of any Senator upon this floor to endeavor to point out mistakes where they occur, changes of policy, if any have transpired, and indeed to discuss the reversal, the metamorphosis as it were, of the whole scheme of dealing with the greatest problem that now confronts the American people.

That the sequence of events may be wholly understood, let me recall to the Senators here that after two months of the labor which we appreciate and for which we yield all honor to the Finance Committee, the committee presented to this body a bill which it defended vigorously, emphatically, and enthusiastically; aye, it defended it in a fashion that convinced me of the logic and the justice, at least, of a part of the bill, the mode of computation of war profits, and of the justice and justness of that rule and of the fact that the rule contemplated by the other House was a rule that could not be tolerated in any tax scheme under any circumstances and could not in this particular instance be tolerated in this scheme.

A bill was presented by the Finance Committee which increased the revenue of war profits by $560,000,000, in round numbers. It was presented admirably and eloquently by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and then he and every member of the Finance Committee stood here before the Senate and said to the United States of America—I quote, I think, exactly the language of one member of that committee—"We have taxed to the very limit of safety by the bill that we thus present to the Senate and to the American people."

It was asserted upon this floor and it was repeated and reiterated by every member of the Finance Committee that the limit had been gone in taxation and in the amount the bill raised of war profits in this crisis. If you desire the pages of the Record where each individual's remarks are given, I have them before me; but I take it that none will gainsay that those who presented this report when first they presented it said to us in language that could not be misunderstood, in words that could not be misinterpreted—in a fashion, indeed, so impressive as to make us for a moment halt and hesitate in the desire that might be ours—that $562,000,000 additional war profits are the limit with safety that Congress can go in this crisis and in this war at this time. Then they presented to us a mode as well by which those excess war profits were computed, a mode which I most heartily indorse and which the distinguished Senator from North Carolina, with his persuasive eloquence, on the first day that he stood on this floor and explained his bill and elaborated its provisions convinced us was the only proper mode of computation. He convinced me, and doubtless he convinced all of you, that the method adopted by the House of Representatives for the computation of war profits was a method unascertainable; a mode that was indefinite; a mode that was uncertain; a mode that was vicious indeed in the endeavor to ascertain war profits; and he presented to us, in a bill then given us by the Finance Committee, a mode which seemed equitable and just, and at least a mode in which there were fewest inequalities and by which the fewest wrongs would be done.

This was the first action of the Finance Committee presented to the Senate; this was the mental attitude in which they and we approached this subject but two or three days ago. Then, over night, in the twinkling of an eye, there transpired so remarkable a change that, without disrespect at all I referred to it here, as indicating to you that the position we assumed in the beginning concerning amounts is, after all, a position in reality which by the acts of the Finance Committee they have, indeed, to-day, indorsed. They had told us day after day we had reached the limit of taxation in this land; they told us, Member after Member, "Oh, touch not the flux of industry; turn not aside the tide of productivity; permit that ordinary business to flow in its ordinary course; increase not these rates and this taxation because of the wrong you will do, the ruin that will be the consequence, and the disaster and the cataclysm that will follow any increase of taxation of war profits in this land."

Oh, do you not recall, Senators, the perfervid remarks upon this subject? Then the next day after the struggle began here, substantially, the committee presents to us an increase of a half billion dollars' taxes on what they term the excess war profits of this land. We who stood here asking this increase in taxing the profits of those who made their profits out of the sorrows of others were accused of endeavoring to stop industry, to hinder enterprise, to interfere with the productivity of the land.

We were so accused because we wanted to increase the taxes. We were justified, Senators, by the Finance Committee of the United States Senate when that committee increased these rates by a half billion dollars here in response to a public sentiment of our land. The argument in the Senate, the opposition to the committee's pitiful sum taken from war profits, have borne their fruit; and if nothing more be done, we have won an astounding victory in the practical doubling of war-profits taxes.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for his frankness in respect to this matter. I congratulate him upon the method in which he has presented this measure from the beginning to the end. My view is divergent from his; it may be because of the views that we have held in different environments for many years in the past; but I say to those with these divergent views that I respect them and their views, and I hope that if they have a modicum of esteem for those who hold the contrary view that that modicum of esteem may not be at all lessened by opposition upon a great governmental problem and the expression of our views upon that problem.

The bill brought to us was "the very limit of taxation"; yet a half billion more was then suddenly added. The bill brought to us gave to us a mode of computation for which we contend in this particular amendment—and other amendments will follow that deal with that subject—the bill brought to us a mode of computation of war profits that seemed simply direct and easily ascertainable; and the mode now adopted by the committee amendment is the mode that then the very progenitors of the old mode insisted was of exactly a contrary sort.

I submit to you, therefore, that we have at the outset an amazing situation. After months a bill comes to us that represents the best thought and the best labor of our committee; it was "the limit in taxation"; it eliminated an uncertain and unascertainable, an imperfect, and a vicious method of computation of war profits; it dealt properly with war profits. After the presentation of this bill to us, it is transmuted now to an increase of a half billion dollars without difficulty, although prior to that time it had "reached the very limit of safety in taxation." It is entirely changed in the method of computation and the "vicious method" is adopted. It is not now dealing with what those of us who stand here in favor of this amendment desire to deal with—swollen war profits; it is not dealing with that which is coined out of this crisis and out of this cataclysm in our Nation; it is dealing with profits generally instead of with war profits alone.

So we have this singular situation thus confronting us. Now, what we seek is to touch war profits; what our design is is to take the largest percentage that may be taken of profits that have been coined out of the war. We are not concerned with normal peace profits; we are not concerned with normal industry in its ordinary and its usual flux and flow. We would protect normal profits; we would protect normal business; we would protect normal productivity and normal industry; but we would take the largest percentage that we could of war profits, the very largest that is possible; and that percentage we believe is embraced within the amendment that is presented this morning for action by the Senate.

The fundamental difference between what is presented by the committee and what we endeavor to do by this amendment is that we reach the strong arm of the law, the strong arm of the Government, out to these war profits with the same vigor and the same strength and the same virility, indeed, with the same enthusiasm that all of you reached out the strong arm of the law and threw all the youth of this land into the melting pot of war. We seek by this amendment and by kindred amendments to touch these swollen profits; profits that have come from disaster; that come from our difficulties; that come, indeed, from this crisis in which we find ourselves.

Some Senators say to us, "Wait; wait; wait." They say to us, "Pause; pause; pause; hesitate; hesitate; hesitate." We say to them when these great concerns ask us to wait, wait, wait and to pause, pause, pause what these great profit-making concerns mean is, "Wait until the war is over; wait until safely they have stored away all these war profits, and then you will not be able to touch them or to take any part of them."

That, in brief, is the situation presented by the amendment that is now offered in contradistinction to the position that is taken by some of the concerns and corporations of the nation who are deriving great war profits at the present time. How specious the plea that we are injuring business!

Do you understand—and pardon me for the repetition of what ought to be clear to every Senator—what we are striving to do? Under the plan that was indorsed and approved and advocated and of which the Finance Committee convinced us we take three prewar years—pardon, please, the repetition—1911, 1912, and 1913, and we say that if a corporation or a business institution had during those years first a profit of $75,000 in 1911, a profit of $100,000 in 1912, and a profit of $125,000 in 1913 its average profits are $100,000 for the three years prior to the war. We say—and I but repeat the language, I think, of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and that of his associates on the Finance Committee—that that average represents a fact, not a speculation or a theory; that average of $100,000 for three years is fixed, definite, certain; all men may understand it, and he who runs may read; that $100,000 is the normal profit; it is the ordinary flux and flow of productivity and industry and of business, and we say, "We yield this ordinary flux and flow of industry and of business, we yield this normal profit to the man in business or the corporation in business at this time, and we deduct that sum from the amount of his profits during the war period, and upon the remainder—the amount in excess of the normal peace profits—we levy our tax." That is the system proposed.

Injure business! Every concern in business save where locally there may be some injustice easy to remedy, as was suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] yesterday, every concern in business prior to the war has its prewar profit allowed it; it continues its business; it continues its industry with its prewar profit wholly untouched.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator from California allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes.

Mr. HARDING. I dislike very much to interrupt the Senator's remarks, but I am exceedingly interested in the manner in which the Senator, by his amendment, determines war profits. In order to get his idea, let me state a specific case.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the distinguished Senator from Ohio is about to make an argument upon the proposition, I suggest that he wait until I conclude.

Mr. HARDING. I have no such desire. I merely want to ask the Senator a question in perfect deference. Suppose a concern in my home city, of which I happen to know, during the period 1912-13 had very subnormal profits, owing to the depression of business in its particular line, would the Senator, because of the restoration of better conditions in that business due to the activity of 1915 and 1916, count the profits of the latter years as war profits?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg the Senator's pardon, but has he concluded his question?

Mr. HARDING. Yes; I only want to know if the excess or unusual earnings of 1915 and 1916 of a perfectly normal concern not in any way connected with war, as compared with its earnings under the subnormal conditions of 1912 and 1913, would be considered war profits?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes; if they were in excess of the profits during the prewar period. I have repeated again and again, and repeat now so that there may be no further misapprehension about it, that an excess of profits over the prewar period prescribed by the Finance Committee would be considered as war profits. That is quite so. Now, I take it that the distinguished Senator, by reason of his query, favors, of course, the amendment that has been presented by the Finance Committee and its mode of determining war profits. While, of course, I recognize that that particular mode of computation has now been arrived at after a labor not as great, however, as that which resulted in the mode that was presented to us in the first instance, but nevertheless one that is justified very eloquently and emphatically by the members of the Finance Committee, yet permit me, if you please, inasmuch as the Senator from Ohio has asked me the question, doubtless with the idea in view that the mode provided first by the Finance Committee is the appropriate mode—permit me to read what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said when he was discussing this question originally before the Senate when this bill was first presented. I read from page 5967 of the RECORD:

The Senate draft of this title of the bill differs very materially from the House draft as to the method of ascertaining the normal income of the taxpayer and as to the method of imposing the tax. The House bill proceeds upon the assumption that everybody, in whatever occupation or business engaged, was making identically the same per cent of profit before the war. It is a standard based upon a manifest fallacy—upon an assumption that our experience tells us does not conform to the facts.

And yet the standard now adopted by the Finance Committee is substantially logically the same standard concerning which the Senator from North Carolina was then inveighing. He continued:

Everybody does not make, and everybody never did make, the same percentage of profits. If you are going to tax war profits you must ascertain in some just and equitable way the actual prewar profits of the individual taxpayer.

That is what we contend for now. We take the only mode that is known, the only mode by which the facts can be ascertained, and we believe, though we recognize that in any taxing scheme there will be inequalities, that this mode we thus take is the one that should prevail. The Senator from North Carolina said, further:

The standard must reflect the facts of the individual case, and it must be equitable. It must be founded upon fact and upon truth and not upon assumption and fiction.

And this was in relation, mind you, to the particular mode adopted by the House, which is to-day substantially the mode adopted by the Finance Committee of the Senate. How do you reconcile these two positions? I read again from the same page:

The bitter, intense opposition to the House measure, which was reflected in the hearings before the Finance Committee, which have been printed and are in the possession of Senators, shows that the objection was not to the amount of the tax—for that was so exceedingly low in view of the conditions that nobody could object to it—it was upon the ground that the base upon which the tax was made to rest was a fictitious base—one that did not reflect the facts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to inquire what he means by "war profits determined as hereinafter provided." Does the Senator propose to follow this with some other amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLETCHER. Or does the Senator adopt the amendment of the Finance Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, Mr. President. In response to the Senator—and I am very glad he asked the query, because I want to repeat and repeat, iterate and reiterate, what last night was several times said, that our design is to adopt the mode which was presented first by the Finance Committee, the mode about which I am now talking, and amendments have been prepared which, if this amendment be adopted, will be presented eliminating the House mode that has now at this late date been adopted by the Finance Committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I take it, then, that the Senator refers in that language to section 203 as presented by the Finance Committee, section 203 being the mode in which this is to be determined?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes. I will say to the Senator that this, being the first section in sequence, is first attacked. Immediately afterwards the subsequent section will be sought to be amended, to return to the mode of estimating prewar profits suggested by the Finance Committee in its original report.

I return now to reading the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina upon the particular mode that now has his sanction.

Mr. POMERENE and Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield to both Senators—to either.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio, the Chair believes, first addressed the Chair.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understand the Senator from California, his statement was that he hoped to return to the original plan of the Finance Committee for the determination of prewar profits. Am I correct?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The Senator is correct.

Mr. POMERENE. So that under the plan which the Senator would like to have the Senate adopt it would be possible for a given company to earn on an average 100 per cent on its capital stock during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and that same amount—namely, 100 per cent—if earned during the current year, would be exempt from this so-called war-profits tax?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Unquestionably, if they were alike. There is no question on that score. The theory that we have in mind is that we will endeavor to protect these profits. If there were some peace profits that were excessive after the sum that might be considered normal, it is infinitely better that that normal business shall be protected rather than that we should protect swollen war profits. That is the attitude I assume in this matter.

Mr. OWEN and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. OWEN. The suggestion I desired to make was that in order that those not familiar with the proposed subsequent amendments might understand, it ought to be very clearly stated what are the subsequent amendments which are referred to by the pending amendment; otherwise, it would not be understood. I did not understand it in reading it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I shall be very glad to explain that to the Senator; but it has been the subject matter, really, of discussion these past few days, and I confess a diffidence in the repetition of matters that I have heard so often here. But I shall be delighted, indeed, to explain that the Senate committee now has presented an amendment to succeeding sections—an amendment which I do not wish to take the time to read but with which I assume the Senate is more or less familiar—that changes the base of computation, but it changes the base of computation by the addition of three lines.

If you will turn to the Senate amendment on page 2, in subsection 203, subdivision (a), you will observe that the first six lines of subdivision (a) are substantially the lines of the original bill presented by the Senate committee; but the addition is made by the Finance Committee that the deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year. It is these last three lines that we seek to eliminate, if we can, in order to preserve the system that the Senate Finance Committee first presented to us.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's amendment will be applicable whether the change that the Senator suggests is made or not, will it not?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir; but I would not wish it applicable except with the change. I say that very frankly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am trying to ascertain the reference which the Senator has made to the new committee amendment. Is it incorporated in this matter which I hold in my hand here, consisting of 18 pages, numbered the same as the original bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator mean the committee amendment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No, sir. The committee amendment is embraced within six pages. I am very glad that we may be set right on that point. I find—and you will pardon me for thus stating—in talking to various Senators, that some of them have very little conception of what we are seeking to do, or how we are seeking to do it. Therefore, I recapitulate further for the moment. It is impossible to make a connected argument under the circumstances, but if I am able to emphasize a single point I shall have accomplished the result I desire.

I reiterate, what we seek to do is to take the swollen war profits of this land. I take it that an answering echo to that sentiment will be found within the bosoms of many of the Senators here; and when we agree upon that premise, if we agree, there should not be the slightest hesitancy or doubt as to how we should go forward to take those swollen war profits.

I repeat again—pardon this iteration, please—the Finance Committee told us how to do it, after two months of extraordinary labor. They told us to take the profits of 1911, of 1912, and of 1913, to average the profits for those years, and that that average would constitute the profits before the war. Then they ascertained, they said, the war profits. I am leaving out details and percentages now, for which you will pardon me. They ascertained the war profits, and from the ascertained amount of war profits they would deduct the prewar average profits—the peace profits, if I may term them such—and upon the amount thus left, after deducting from the war profits the peace profits, we figure our taxes. That was the scheme presented by the Finance Committee after two months of arduous and difficult and conscientious labor.

The scheme that they now present, that was presented only two or three brief days ago, is that instead of taking this ascertained actual amount, as the Senator from North Carolina designated it, you take from 6 to 10 per cent on the capital, and this 6 to 10 per cent on the capital you deduct from the war profits to ascertain the amount upon which the tax shall be paid. Any Senator who has had experience in the past with ascertaining the capital of a corporation, I do not care how you safeguard it—any Senator who has, during any active career, governmental or otherwise, had to deal with great corporations in ascertaining their value or ascertaining their capital—knows that when you take the last method that is proposed by the Finance Committee of 6 to 10 per cent on the capital, you do just what the Senator from North Carolina told us you would do only a week or two ago: You put a premium upon that corporation's ability to hoodwink and deceive and exploit the Government.

I resume now, reading the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina in denunciation of the very scheme that now is presented under the amendment of the Finance Committee:

We struck this arbitrary standard out and substituted a standard based upon the actual results of each man's business operations.

Oh, Senators, if this was the mode of computing war profits but a few short days ago, and for the two months that the Finance Committee labored, may not we who are young, and who are inexperienced here, believe that it is the appropriate way now to compute war profits?

We allow a deduction of the average profits actually made during the three years immediately preceding the outbreak of the war. We make provisions for exceptional cases where, by reason of misfortune, or of circumstances, a man was not making a normal profit during that period but was making an abnormally low profit compared with the profit of like business. Under the bill now before you—

This was before the amendment, you know—if the Secretary of the Treasury shall find that a man's profit was abnormally low during the three last years, he must permit him to have an exemption equal to the average profits made by representative concerns in like business during those three prewar years.

We selected the three years named in the bill because, after a very thorough investigation—on the part of the experts, comparing all the years between 1909 and 1915—1909 being the year in which we first began to get reports from corporations under the income-tax law—we were advised, taking the business of the whole country into account, that the years selected were the most favorable group for the average taxpayer; but it is charged, Mr. President, that our base is wrong and that the base of the House is correct.

It occupied two months, in reality—

Oh, I compliment again the Senator from North Carolina upon his able and his convincing argument. Lay it not against me, please, if, accepting this argument enthusiastically, I indorse the mode now. I ascribe it to his persuasive eloquence, as the representative of the Finance Committee, in presenting so forcefully, and in presenting with a logic that could not be gainsaid or disputed, the mode for which we now contend, and to which, alas, he is now opposed.

He continues:

I have looked up this matter with a view to ascertaining what base is used by European countries which have imposed war-profits taxes.

Then follows his discussion of European countries, wherein he points out that of all the nations of the world that have laid war profits but Spain and Canada have adopted anything of the percentage method. Then he proceeds further:

Under the 8 per cent method of determining prewar profits of the House bill—

His mode now is 6 to 10 per cent, I grant—undoubtedly many of the great corporations and trusts of the country who are now making enormous war profits would, by reason of overcapitalization and watered stock, largely, if not altogether, escape the proposed tax.

Why, Senators, do you realize that the chairman of the Finance Committee, with all the power and with all the prestige that that position gives to him, said to us on the 15th day of August last, in a speech that was a memorable effort in this great body, that if we adopted this percentage method the corporations of the country, by reason of chicanery and over capitalization, would escape these great war taxes? I repeat, and repeat to you his language, because what I want—aye, what you want; aye, what the American people want—is that we shall catch these great, swollen war profits, and that we shall turn them to the benefit of this war and of this Government. And when solemnly we are assured by the chairman of the Finance Committee that a rule he now invokes will possibly permit great corporations to escape, I ask you how is it possible for you to vote for that particular rule, no matter how specious may be the plea for the preservation of business or for keeping industry and productivity in its normal channels?

I read you one more paragraph, and then I cease, of this sort: This was made quite clear—

What was made quite clear? That—

Undoubtedly many of the great corporations and trusts of the country who are now making enormous war profits would, by reason of over-capitalization and watered stock, largely, if not altogether, escape the proposed tax. This was made quite clear to your committee not merely by information and statistics obtained through the departments and other sources but from the statements of representative men, thoroughly familiar with corporate practices and organization, who appeared before us in vigorous protest against this part of the House bill.

It was made quite clear to the Finance Committee and to the chairman of the Finance Committee that by the rule now sought to be put into effect the great corporations of the country that have waxed fat off our trial and our travail and our trouble and our blood would escape this war tax; and, being made clear, the Senate of the United States is now asked to adopt that particular rule.

I leave with you the mode of levying these war-profits taxes "Injury to business" is the only answer that he has made to that which we seek to do—"injury to business," mind you. What we do—and I beg you to keep it before you when we come to vote upon these amendments—is this: We first give the normal prewar profit, untouched so far as this tax is concerned. That of itself is something and protects, preserves, and conserves ordinary business and normal profits. Next, after we have given to these who make the swollen war profits the normal peace profits, we let them retain untouched all the war profits that they have made up to this particular time. When I say that England has now a war-profits tax of 80 per cent, I am answered by the statement that England first took 50, next took 60, and next took 80 per cent. But I call to your attention the fact that when England was taking 50 per cent we were giving 100 per cent of war profits to our own, when England was taking 60 per cent we were giving 100 per cent of war profits to our own, and when England is taking 80 per cent we are undertaking a liability in excess of what England, for the particular current period, is undertaking.

So when we ask that you take 80 per cent war profits, when we leave the normal profit to the corporation or the individual, when they have had three years untouched of swollen war profits in this Nation, and when we give them back of their war profits now coined out of us 20 or 25 per cent, how can it be said that we injure business or that we are doing an injustice or a wrong to any concern in this Nation?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. It has been represented—I do not know with what measure of authority—that in some cases a very large part of the war profits to which the Senator just referred have been invested in the form of property which if the war should end would be valueless, and I would be glad if the Senator would explain what he thinks with regard to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Let us assume that to be the fact; they have had three years of those war profits untouched. Do you think that they have invested in betterments during those three years all their war profits? If they have, well and good; they have their betterments without the taxation of war profits; and if they have not, they still have the profits. And so whether they have put back some of their profits in their investment, when without taxation they have had all those profits, is no argument against the present tax.

We are not without experience in this regard at all. We have not only the experience of other nations but we have the experience of England with an 80 per cent war-profits tax. And what do our English brethren say? They say to us that business there never has been better, and that the excess gives them a legitimate and reasonable and, indeed, a large profit upon their investment; and this, mind you, though England has been taking 60 per cent and 50 per cent in the years that have gone, while we have taken nothing in those particular years.

I ran across recently a statement by an Englishman that seems to me to be so refreshing in this day when we prate of England and England's example, when we draft and do the like because our British brethren tell us from their experience it is the thing to do, that I want to read the remarks made by a certain gentleman who was at the head of the steel industry of Scotland at the time the war-profits tax first went into existence in England. He did not seem palsied with fear by a large war-profits tax. I read from the Bankers' Magazine of London, from its issue of December, 1915. Here is what was said by the chairman of the Steel Co. of Scotland:

To my mind there is something absolutely revolting in the idea of anybody making profits out of the nation's agony, and especially so in the case of a man or a company who have had no extra labor or anxiety, but whose opportunity has come solely because of an artificial scarcity created by the Government on account of the nation's need. This war, God knows, will bring untold suffering in more than one form to millions who have no war profits to collect and no war bonus to receive, and therefore I have felt in my own mind, long before this proposal was made, that in that direction the Government would be entirely justified in asking those who have made profits to assist those who are less fortunate. It may be, indeed, that before the war is ended—

This was the head of the Steel Co. of Scotland that was speaking when the first tax was levied upon war profits—

It may be, indeed, that before the war is ended the Government may find it necessary to take not 50 but 100 per cent of those extra profits, and if they do I hope that none of us will complain. As I have said before, sacrifice is demanded all round, and there are hundreds of thousands of others who are making infinitely greater sacrifice than is possible to us.

I commend the patriotic words of this captain of industry of England to the Senate of the United States. Is our position to be sacrifice demanded of all, sacrifice demanded of everybody and of everything but war profits? With war profits we must deal gingerly and timidly and tenderly.

I heard the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] last night say that we were taking, as I recall it, and I beg him to correct me if I am in error, 31 per cent of the estimated war profits for the next fiscal year. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMOOT. I said that under the substitute amendment of the committee the average rate will be 31½ per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir; thank you.

Mr. SMOOT. However, the graduated rate begins at 12 per cent and increases until it reaches 60 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. You will understand there is a graduated rate in this bill. I do not speak to you of the specific rate, because upon a prior occasion something has been said in that regard; but taking all the amount that is raised from war profits by this amendment of the committee, you get what? Fifty per cent that England took when she had no such liability as ours? Sixty per cent in the second year of the war? Eighty per cent in the third year of the war? Why, no; we are so halting and so hesitant, we are so tender and so timid that we take out of the swollen war profits 31 per cent, when we have undertaken a liability, or will have done so soon, of $21,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator from California desires to be perfectly fair, and if I did not believe that fully I would not interrupt him at this time; but I believe, in stating what tax was imposed on war profits by England, it would be fair on the part of the Senator to say that in this bill there is an income tax that exceeds the combined income-tax rates of England and any other one country.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will leave that to some of my colleagues to discuss. That is not what I am speaking of. I am speaking of war-profits taxes, and whence the timidity that should overcome us? Why is it that when we come to touch war profits we should take 31 per cent and 31 per cent only? Our friends upon the other side said to us we must not touch legitimate business and must leave a modicum ultimately for us to tax. Oh, no; oh, no; there will be no modicum to tax the instant that the war ceases. The nub and rub in this whole thing is hesitate, halt, retreat, bow our heads, of course do not touch more than 31 per cent of the war profits; wait, wait, and then when the war is over the other 70 per cent will be in the pockets of those who coined our blood in this war, and it will stay in the pockets of those who thus coin our blood. Wait, wait; for what? You have not waited with your men; you have not waited with your women; you have not hesitated to break hearts and to break bodies and to send men up against the gun and scatter them in the four corners of the earth. Wait now and take 30 per cent when the opportunity is with us to take without injury to a single occupation or a single business a real sum and to cause this wealth to make this sacrifice just as you cause human beings in this land to make their sacrifice.

Senators, you remember a few days ago in stentorian tones the members of the Finance Committee said that some people who were endeavoring to impose higher taxes were endeavoring to make this war unpopular. They did not mean that, of course, because they immediately imposed a half billion dollars more of taxes, and I would not insinuate that they did it to make this war unpopular. When they raised these taxes a half billion dollars, as they did, they justified and they vindicated every man upon this floor who has contended for a higher rate of war taxes. Popularity of this war! I do not intend to touch upon this, and I did not in what little I said the other day. Let me say to you gentlemen who stand here to-day taking 31 per cent of the war profits of this land, when England takes 80 per cent, and when you can take 60 or 70 or 80 per cent, if this war is made unpopular you are the ones who will make it so. I say to you, not in-vidiously and not in harsh criticism at all, that your purpose, our purpose, the purpose of every man upon this floor ought to be to make the war popular, to do everything for its success, to have behind the line of trenches in France a line in America that is contented and happy, and a line in America that feels that no injustice has been done it. This is the like purpose, I take it, of all of us here, and in doing what we do to-day we will do much on the one hand or the other to determine the popularity of this war in the days to come.

Last night the Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot], for whom I have very high respect, in speaking concerning this amendment and in opposition to it, said:

I do not believe the people of this country are going to say to all the railroads of the country, "You have not got to pay a cent of excess-profits tax." I do not believe that the people of this country will say to Mr. Henry Ford, "Notwithstanding you made $54,000,000 in 1916, you shall be exempt from paying one cent of excess-profits or war tax."

Last night the distinguished Senator said that one of the reasons, in effect inferentially at least, why the amendment of the committee was presented was that the railroads of the country should not escape taxation, and that Mr. Henry Ford might be required to pay his due share. Last night the Senator from Utah said that. When he spoke the other day in respect to railroads—I quote him merely that we may have both statements before the Senate—he had this to say:

This is not a tax upon railroads. It falls upon the shippers and upon persons traveling upon the railroads. The committee sympathizes with the position just stated by my colleague. I think the committee will be criticized before the bill passes for making an exception in one or two cases for the railroads. I think we will hear a good deal from some Senators as to how we have yielded to that wonderful monopolistic power.

The first voice we have heard upon this subject of railroads was last night, when the change of the committee was justified by the Senator from Utah upon the ground that it would tax railroads. I have read from the Record so that his words might be quoted accurately.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. So that Senators may know the basis and what called forth those remarks, I wish to state that the question of the tax upon the parcel post and express companies was under consideration, and I called attention to the fact that such a tax was a tax upon transportation. Then I referred to the fact that if there was an exemption allowed of 8 per cent—I do not know that I stated the per cent at that time, but I have since, I will say to the Senator—if there was a flat exemption of 8 per cent there would be only a few railroads in the country that would pay a tax under the House provision or the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama. The one is a tax upon transportation, the other a tax upon excess profits.

I say to the Senator now that if the average rate of profits made by railroad companies during the prewar period was 6 per cent and no more, then under the original amendment of the Senate committee they would not pay a single cent of excess profits and under the substitute they would not pay a single cent of excess profits. But if there is a railroad company that makes more than 10 per cent, I care not what the percentage is, then that railroad company will be compelled to pay an excess-profits tax under the substitute of the committee.

I stand upon the same ground, I will say to the Senator, that I did last night, and for the information of the Senator I wish to say that I stand upon the same ground that I did in the committee, as I could not defend a proposition that exempted the Ford company and other companies making the swollen fortunes referred to by the Senator from taxation.

I referred last night, the Senator will remember, to one corporation that was making during the prewar period 890 per cent on its actual capital invested, and it is making about the same to-day. Under the original plan there would have been no tax imposed on that company, but under the substitute there will be a tax upon 880 per cent of the profits.

If I am not intruding upon the Senator, there are a number of Senators here who were not present last night, and I wish to say that I gave the reasons why the committee made the change. I am not going to repeat them now, but I suppose that will be done by other members of the committee—reasons which I think absolutely justify the change.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am delighted with the interruption of the Senator from Utah. I would not for the world even inferentially misstate his position. You probably will observe the care I have taken to-day when I did endeavor to repeat what has been said on the floor of the Senate in each instance to read from the Record. Now, without further comment I read again to what I just referred. Last evening the amendment was presented that is now before the Senate. The Senator from Utah most emphatically in opposition to the amendment arose and in the very beginning of what he had to say his opposition was voiced in these terms:

I do not believe the people of this country are going to say to all the railroads of the country, "You have not got to pay a cent of excess-profits tax."

And then followed his remark about Mr. Ford. I read what he said in his former speech of August 14:

The committee sympathizes with the position just stated by my colleague. I think the committee will be criticized before the bill passes for making an exception in one or two cases for the railroads. I think we will hear a good deal from some Senators as to how we have yielded to that wonderful monopolistic power. However, there is no question, Mr. President, but that the railroads are at the present time put to their wits' end to meet the present situation, and there is no question but that every encouragement should be given to them in order that they may provide transportation facilities to handle the business of the country. To-day it is impossible for them to do it, and, as far as I am concerned, I would not add an unnecessary burden to them.

And with these two excerpts thus read verbatim I leave the subject with the Senate. If any Senator is familiar with something of that which is printed across the water he will realize that in Germany the people are being told how we have lived in luxury, how inept we are; how soft and unwilling to sacrifice; how our great corporations that have made their war profits will never turn them over, and that we have not the courage to take those profits; and we can strike our strongest blow not alone in our preparation of men, not alone in getting ready the youth of this land to fight our battles abroad, but demonstrate that the wealth of the Nation we take as well; that not alone can we enlist the man power, but that we can take as well the money power of this land. If we desire first to popularize the war, we can do it by taking that which ought to be taken, by showing to the world that we have taken a sum never before taken in the history of any civilized nation; and that we are going forward not only with our men and with all of the humanity of our Nation, but that we are going forward in exactly the same fashion with the wealth of this Nation.

Mr. President, I have spoken longer upon this subject than was my intention. I feel so deeply upon it, however—I think that it means so much to this particular situation—that I have taxed the patience of the Senate, probably, and I have taxed my endurance as well. This is not alone, Senators, a war-profits tax bill; it is not alone a question of conscripting our wealth; but, after all, from the 2d day of April until the day the conflict shall be finally determined it is a struggle between the old individualistic democracy of the past, where every man was for himself, where he took who could and kept who would; it is the contest that will now be everlasting between that old philosophy of government and the philosophy of government that has come to us in this war; where every man is for the State and where, when the State is endangered, every man, every woman, every child, and all of its wealth must be taken for the defense of the State.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am going to ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I state as briefly as I can what the Committee on Finance has actually done and what it has not done. The committee was confronted with the House proposition of exempting 8 per cent of all profits and imposing 16 per cent on all profits in excess of that 8 per cent. That hard-and-fast basis of exemption seemed to the committee to present many objectionable features: One was that an arbitrary line, with no elasticity, could by no means be fair to different kinds of business; the other was that it at once raised the question as to what was the capital upon which the 8 per cent was to be calculated. It seemed to the committee well that these difficulties should, so far as possible, be avoided. The committee therefore adopted for its basis of exemption what is known as the prewar normal profits provision. They have not changed that basis in the amendment. Then we imposed certain graduated rates, based on the increase of profits over the prewar years.

We provided for the corporations which earned no profits or which were new corporations, and for what are known as the subnormal corporations and partnerships—those which had made very low profits—by putting in a clause which allowed an exemption equal to the average of like business in the prewar period. It was known that in some lines of business the profits of all engaged in that line were subnormal. We therefore added the 6 per cent limitation—that the basis of exemption in the case of subnormal profits should not go below 6 per cent. We left out, and we deliberately left out, in our original bill what were known as supernormal profits—that is, the profits of concerns which were making very large profits before the war as well as since 1914.

After the bill had been reported to the Senate on that basis, which confined the tax to war profits—I ask that the word “swollen” may be understood as prefixed whenever I refer to war profits—and it had been discussed here, the committee were convinced that they could not possibly successfully defend and support the proposition that the large profits made before the war should entirely escape taxation. We therefore met this objection by putting on a limitation similar to the limitation on the subnormal—that is, that the exemption in the case of supernormal prewar profits should not go beyond 10 per cent; but the basis of exemption was still to be, and is, calculated as it was in the original bill; it has not been changed. We calculate the profits for the purpose of obtaining the exemption on the three prewar years, and then we allow an exemption which shall not be higher than 10 per cent upon the capital stock, or, if the profits were subnormal, which shall not be lower than 6 per cent of the capital.

Of course, this change requires a more exacting and wider investigation of what constitutes capital than did the original plan of the committee; but we have adopted the House definition of capital and we have given the Secretary of the Treasury a large discretion in determining what the capital is in any given case. I think we are entirely protected on this point.

The only substantial change made by the committee in reporting this amendment as a substitute for the original amendment was to put the 10 per cent limitation on the supernormal prewar profits. Putting on that limitation added $435,000,000 to the amount to be raised by the tax.

Mr. President, it is an entire mistake to suppose that this increase comes entirely out of corporations which made large profits before the war and are making large profits still but no additional profits. It bears much more heavily on those corporations which were making large profits before the war and which have been making still larger profits since the war began.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. May I ask the Senator if he can furnish any statement or any data, so that we may have it in the RECORD, as to the amount which will be raised from corporations under the amendment which is now proposed by the committee?

Mr. LODGE. By the 10 per cent limitation?

Mr. BORAH. By the 10 per cent limitation.

Mr. LODGE. The estimated amount in gross is $435,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any statement as to the class of corporations, and so forth, from which that will come?

Mr. LODGE. I have no detailed statement here. I know of only one specific instance—the Ford Motor Car Co.—which would escape taxation under the House bill and under our previous bill; but under this amendment it will pay $9,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. The information that I desired was with reference to how much this would increase the tax upon those corporations which were peculiarly and particularly engaged in the manufacture of munitions, and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. I have not examined those details. They can undoubtedly be examined; but, of course, the limitation of 10 per cent will in most cases increase the tax by lowering their exemption.

Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was saying that the 10 per cent limitation was the only change made by the committee, except adding a new bracket imposing 60 per cent taxation on profits above 300 per cent. We do not change our rates; we do not change our basis of calculation for exemptions. All we have done was to put a limitation on supernormal profits equivalent to the limitation placed on subnormal profits. That limitation of 10 per cent on supernormal profits, as I have said, will give us $435,000,000 more revenue, and the additional bracket, imposing 60 per cent on profits above 300 per cent, will give us $63,000,000 more. That will give us, all told, including what is raised by the present law, $1,260,000,000 from profits, for this change of the limitation has extended the tax from war profits to profits generally.

I believe that the general feeling of the country and of the Senate is that it is better not to attempt to segregate war profits, but to tax all profits above a certain point.

My own personal preference was for the segregation of war profits, but when the bill came up for discussion it seemed to me that it was impossible to avoid injustice without putting a limitation upon concerns earning supernormal profits, and that has been done. The fact that I have changed my mind on that point, and yielded to the views of the majority of the committee and, as I believe, of the majority of the Senate I now freely admit, because I do not think the argument of inconsistency, which will probably be made, is of any consequence.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. In order that I may be able to understand the view of the committee I desire to ask a question. The exemption or deduction from the profits which are not to be taxed is limited to an amount not less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital. I am not quite sure that I understand just how this rule is to be applied. To illustrate the difficulty that is in my mind, assume, for the sake of argument, that a certain class of industrial institutions may have a normal profit of 6 per cent, some may have a normal profit of 8 per cent, and some may have a normal profit of 10 per cent. Now, is this exemption to be the same as applied to a given class of institutions, or will the discretion of the Treasury Department be so exercised that an exemption can be made as to one institution of 6 per cent, as to another 7 per cent, as to another 8 per cent, as to another 9 per cent, and as to another 10 per cent?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand it, when the prewar profits of corporations are shown they are entitled to the exemption upon those profits whatever they may be, not to exceed 10 per cent and not to be less than 6 per cent of the capital stock.

Mr. POMERENE. Do I understand that statement to mean, then, that in the administration of the law there could be a different exemption, between these two limitations, to each and every institution?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, they have, of course, the privilege of taking the average of like business if they see fit; and if it is higher than 6 per cent they can take the average of like business up to 10. If a concern is making less than 6 per cent, it can take the average of like business in the prewar period, or it can take 6 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. The discretion lies with the taxpayer, then, and not with the taxgatherer?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely. If the average of like business is 7 or 8 per cent, the subnormal business gets that. If it is less than 6 per cent in the whole line of business, he gets 6 per cent.

Mr. President, on the same rates, with the addition of the rate of 60 per cent, we are raising this enormous sum of money. It is a very large sum to take out of the profits of business. It is not a question of seizing on the profits of business or on incomes that we are concerned with. It is perfectly easy to say and quite true that we are giving our blood and the lives of those whom we love far better than our own lives. The question here is how we are going to use the resources of the country so as to make them most efficient in promoting success in the war. We are not here to punish business success. We are not here to conduct a crusade against wealth because it is wealth. We are here to use that wealth and to take that wealth in just such a way as will be most profitable to the country. If it is profitable to the country to take it all, take it all; if it is more profitable to the country to take a portion of it in order that we may go on taking it in future years, then take a portion. If it is better to leave some to the business so that we can have money to put into our bonds—for we must have bonds—to leave some so that it may be used to expand and keep business alive, then take such portion as will permit those things to come to pass.

There is nothing patriotic in closing down the sources of revenue and forcing this country to go to heavy consumption taxes. It is true the average of our rates is 31½ per cent, but we have adopted the graduated tax wisely. We go, in our 60 per cent bracket, 20 per cent above England in the first year of the war. We begin as low as 12 per cent. I think it is wise to tax the small businesses, with the small profits, on a moderate scale. I think it is wise to take as high as 60 per cent from the great corporations making the great profits.

There has been pointed out to us what England took during the first two years of the war, and that we did not take it. The reason is simple, we did not take it because we were not at war. Now we are at war, and we ought to husband and tax our resources in such a way as to get the most money possible out of them. We must look to them, we must look to profits and incomes—they all come from the same fund—for the great mass of the money we spend and the money we borrow and the money which keeps business in activity. It is the only source where we can borrow money, and you are going to pinch these resources of profits and incomes down with price fixing, which is going to reduce the total amount, and we ought to consider this and leave them enough to go on with. That is all I desire.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator says that the 60 per cent rate, which is the highest rate fixed in the graduated scale of the new amendment proposed by the committee, is 20 per cent higher than the first rate fixed by Great Britain. I am certain that the Senator must have misspoken himself there, because the first rate fixed by Great Britain was 50 per cent and not 40 per cent, as so often stated in the course of this debate. In the first year of the war Great Britain fixed a war-profits tax of 50 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the lowest tax she ever fixed.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is right; it was 50 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And in less than six months she raised it to 60 per cent; and in November of this last year, 1916, she raised it to 80 per cent.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly true; but it also ought to be remembered that the English exemption is much larger, and that last May she raised her exemptions to 9 per cent for corporations and 11 per cent for individuals. Moreover, we are taking a very heavy income tax in addition. The corporations pay a 6 per cent normal tax under this bill. Every partnership and every individual in business also pays an income tax on what remains after he or the corporation in which he holds shares has paid the excess profits tax. I think the total of the income tax raised under this bill, in addition, is $777,000,000. We get over $900,000,000 altogether, as I recall—a total of $2,100,000,000 out of those sources alone.

Mr. President, I wish to keep business active and productive, because if we do not we shall embarrass our national credit very seriously, and we shall lose our principal source of taxation. For that reason, I think we have gone far enough for the first bill. I do not wish to paralyze business and so find ourselves next year face to face with a billion dollars of consumption taxes. I desire to keep those consumption taxes off, except in a very small degree, as long as may be; and that is why I wish to proceed slowly and not take more than two billions or two billions and a quarter out of profits and incomes at this time.

Mr. President, the German comment on this country, alluded to by the Senator from California, leaves me very cold. I care not at all what people or newspapers, with such principles as the Prussians have, and such a record of blood and murder and dishonored treaties as they have, think of us. It is a matter to which I am totally indifferent. I have but a single desire, and that is to impose these taxes in such a way as to get the greatest possible amount of money and to keep on getting the greatest possible amount of money out of business and incomes, because that is the surest way to success in the war. I wish to keep these taxes at a safe point, so that we can maintain our national credit; for if we do not maintain the credit of the United States we endanger the success of the war.

There is no sound economy in endangering the sources of credit in the desire to punish somebody because he has money. Get his money, and get it for taxes; get it up to 80 or 90 per cent; but do it in such a way that you will not endanger the credit of the country or the normal and proper activity and expansion of business. That has been the purpose of the committee from the beginning. I think in their income taxes and in their profit taxes they have now gone to the very limit of safety—not business safety to the people who are making money, but safety for the Government of the United States, which is raising taxes and floating loans. That is the only safety which interests me. For that reason, Mr. President, I think these extreme rates which are proposed, and especially flat rates, which would fall with perfectly crushing effect on every little business in the country, are to be avoided at this time.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE PARADE.

During the delivery of Mr. LODGE's speech,

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, a number of inquiries have been made of me as to the participation of the Senate in the parade to be held at 4 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday next in honor of the drafted men of the city of Washington. In order that Senators may be advised of what will be done, I move that on Tuesday next, at 3.30 o'clock p. m., the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock the next day. I do that in order that Senators can make their arrangements. They wish to know whether they will have an opportunity to participate in that parade. Therefore I make the motion indicated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Chair please state the motion? Those of us in the rear of the Chamber could not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that on Tuesday next, at 3.30 o'clock, the Senate shall stand in recess until 11 o'clock the next morning, in order that opportunity may be afforded to take part in the draft parade. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest that I do not know just what the condition of the debate will then be with regard to the war-profits tax. Of course, taking a recess at the time indicated would take some two or three hours out of the time allotted for debate upon that subject, unless it is made up in some other way. It may be that the debate will be so far along at that time that the loss of that number of hours will not seriously handicap Senators who desire to speak upon this subject. I do not know as to that. If it does diminish the time allotted for debate upon this question to the exclusion of opportunity for debate which Senators anticipated under the unanimous-consent agreement, I do not think such an order ought to be made at this time, and it occurs to me that it would be better for the Senator from Virginia to withhold his motion until Tuesday, when we can see what the condition of the debate is.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, it was because Senators desired to know in advance what opportunity would be afforded them to participate in the parade that I made the motion; but, since there is objection, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I only want to add one word to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said.

A persistent effort has been made here in the Senate to convey the idea that in some way the Finance Committee has yielded to pressure and has completely reversed the conclusions which the committee had reached after two months of exhaustive consideration of this measure. Mr. President, there is a lack of sincerity in that statement and an absolute lack of truth. The committee, I assume, would have a right to modify its views and suggest modifications to its report as the measure progressed in its consideration in the Senate. As a matter of fact, however, in this particular instance the committee has not in any way altered the basic principles on which it presented this particular part of the revenue bill relating to war profits.

An effort is made to convey the impression that, somehow or other, the committee has recommended increased rates. Mr. President, the rates are identical in the report made day before yesterday by the chairman of the Finance Committee and in the original report, with a single exception—a 10 per cent raise in the highest-bracket. The other rates are identical.

An effort is made to convey the impression that, somehow or other, the committee has been driven to raise $400,000,000 by increased rates. Mr. President, every dollar of that increase, some $400,000,000, which will be collected in taxes by the amendment suggested by the chairman of the Finance Committee day before yesterday, comes solely and exclusively, with the exception of the 10 per cent raise in the highest bracket, from the 10 per cent restriction on the supernormal profits.

The committee in the beginning viewed this tax strictly as a war-profits tax. It was a logical proposition. Here was a war-profit fund accounted for in the records of the Treasury Department and a tax that was computed on the difference between the earnings during the prewar period and the earnings during the taxable year. It was not the purpose of the committee to exhaust every source of taxation in the present bill. The committee is well aware that other sources remain that will have to be called upon as the burdens of the war increase with every month. But a modification was made in the original plan in view of the necessity of largely increased revenues, made evident by the later estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, and in deference to the views of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], as voiced by him on this floor, and other Senators, that it did seem to them that concerns which made a supernormal profit during the prewar period and a profit during the taxable year which was about equivalent to that made during the prewar period, should not altogether escape this additional taxation even if there was, technically speaking, no increase in war profits. Such concerns as the Ford Automobile Co. were cited, the earnings of which during the prewar period were about equivalent to its earnings during the taxable year, and the Utah Copper Co., and numerous other concerns with millions of dollars of income escaping these taxes as defined by the committee computed on a basis of war profits.

Therefore, to get more revenue and to gather it from these concerns, the committee brought in a recommendation that this 10 per cent maximum should apply to these so-called supernormal profits, and in that way these concerns are brought in; but it is no change of base, and there can be no sincerity in any Senator with any knowledge of this measure who charges that there is a change of base. It has been a sincere and a patriotic effort to meet the requirements of the Public Treasury, to meet the views of Senators here on this floor, honestly expressed, not in the vehement accents of the stump orator or of the campaign meeting, but in the calm and deliberate consideration which ought to be extended to a fiscal measure meaning so much to the American people as this does. Every penny of the increased amount, some $400,000,000, which will be collected under the amendment offered by the chairman of the Finance Committee is collected under that 10 per cent maximum of supernormal earnings, with the single exception of the comparatively small amount of some $60,000,000 collected under the 10 per cent increase on the highest surtax.

The committee has in no sense reversed itself. It has simply extended the comprehensive character of the measure and endeavored in every way to make it fair and equitable to the taxpayer and to collect the largest amount of revenue possible under the circumstances.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not wish to disturb the Senator, but I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. PENROSE. I am through.

Mr. GRONNA. I made the statement yesterday that the committee had in a way reversed its position. I do not wish to do the members of the committee an injustice, and I said so at that time. Is it not a fact, however, that the basic principle upon which this war tax is to be raised is upon excess profits, and that in the first instance the committee did not place a limitation upon the amount of profits made before the war, but that the amendment which the committee has now reported does place a limitation upon it? Does not that in itself reverse the position of the committee?

Mr. PENROSE. No, Mr. President; I do not consider it in any way a reversal. It is a modification and an extension of the views of the committee, but not a reversal. The war profits, or the proposition between the minimum of 6 per cent and the maximum of 10 per cent, has its ebb and flow in the computation of the tax.

Mr. GRONNA. If I may ask the Senator another question—

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Were not these matters discussed by the committee? I understand the committee knew there are corporations and perhaps individuals that made enormous profits before the war. Was not that question discussed in the committee before the first report was made as well as it had to be done when the second amendment was agreed upon?

Mr. PENROSE. I have endeavored already to explain that the committee in its discretion took strictly war profits as the fund to be taxed, and later on modified the proposition and extended the grasp of the law so as to include everything over 10 per cent of the supernormal profits. I have already explained that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there ought not to be any confusion about this matter. It seems to me it is very plain and simple.

The amendment now presented by the committee retains the original proposition that the taxpayer's normal profits, his peace profits, the profits which he was making before the war began, shall be determined for the purposes of his exemption from the profits tax imposed in this bill by ascertaining the actual amount of profits the taxpayer was making during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and getting the annual average of that amount. This amount, whatever it may be, constitutes, within the meaning of the amendment, the prewar earnings of the taxpayer, and he is entitled to that amount as an exemption from his earnings during the taxable year, and upon the excess the tax is imposed.

The committee's original proposition also contained a provision which amounted to a minimum exemption in favor of the men whose earnings during the prewar period were subnormal compared with the profits of representative concerns in like business.

Many cases were presented to the committee of corporations during those years that made very little money. In other instances it was shown that some corporations making a fairly good profit in one or two of those years made very little, if anything, in the third year, and that necessarily cut down its average profits during those three years.

In other words, the committee's original proposition was a flat exemption to the extent of the average profits actually made in the operation of the business during the three years named, with a proviso in favor of the taxpayer whose profits were subnormal during these years.

Shortly after the committee's second report of the bill to the Senate there arose a demand that a maximum limitation be placed upon prewar profits, upon the ground that the individual or the corporation making a large profit during the prewar years—a profit, say, of 15, 25, or more per cent—might not be making more than that now, or, if making more than that, would be allowed an exemption to the full extent of the 25 or 30 per cent profits made before the war.

Senators on both sides of this Chamber favorable to the amendment objected to that and urged and demanded that we bring in an amendment fixing a maximum exemption upon supernormal as well as a minimum exemption upon subnormal prewar profits.

Your committee yielded to these importunities and demands and modified its original amendment, which provided that the average profits of the prewar years selected by the committee should constitute the amount of the taxpayers' exemption from the tax, by prescribing a maximum and a minimum limitation upon such exemption, the minimum being 6 per cent, or about the same as in the original bill, and the maximum being 10 per cent. The effect of the maximum is to limit the exemption based on prewar profits to 10 per cent on capital invested during the taxable year; that is, say, the exemption from the tax shall not in any case be more than 10 per cent of the capital invested, so that where the prewar profits exceed 10 per cent of the capital invested in any taxable year the total excess becomes subject to the tax.

Now, that is the change the amendments criticized in the bill, made by the Senator from California, make from the original draft.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] reads very extensively from a speech which I made at the time of the presentation of the original report of the Finance Committee of the bill to the Senate, and graciously compliments me upon some of the utterances he quotes. The Senator says that in that speech I took the position that in levying a war-profits tax that the only true and just basis of exemption was the actual profits made during the prewar or peace period by the taxpayer. The Senator is correct. The speech correctly states my position then and now. Under the original amendment the tax imposed was intended to be and it was a war-profits tax. It was intended to be specifically a war-profits tax, and, Mr. President, if it was to be distinctively a tax upon war profits, then it was absolutely necessary that it should be predicated upon actual profits of the preceding peace period and not upon an arbitrarily assumed profit. Otherwise, it would be not only a tax upon war profits but it would be in the nature of a composite tax in part upon peace profits and in part upon war profits. Acting upon the assumption that the Senate and the country wanted us to impose a war-profits tax, we wrote the amendment so as to make the tax distinctively such, and carefully adjusted the rates so the tax would be heaviest where the war profits were the largest.

But, Mr. President, as I have before said, it was disclosed soon after we reported the bill that there was a strong demand in the Senate and to some extent in the country that this tax be made not only a war-profits tax but that it also be made an excess-profits tax, and we proceeded in response to that demand to change the character of the tax so that while it retains—and, Senators, I call your attention to that—while it retains the features of a war-profits tax for the purpose of getting revenue whether from those who are making swollen profits out of the war or others, it also indirectly but effectually levies a tax upon peace profits as well.

Let us see how that is, Mr. President, by a concrete example. Under the limitation that we have placed now, assuming that a concern was making before the war an amount equal to 30 per cent profit upon the capital for the taxable year, our original proposition would tax it no more than the excess of the profits during that year over that 30 per cent. That 30 per cent we have assumed as the peace profits. Under the new scheme a man who was making that same profit before the war instead of being entitled to the total exemption of 30 per cent upon his invested capital will only be entitled to 10 per cent upon his invested capital.

Is it not clear, therefore, that when we impose these rates upon him, having cut down his exemption, having reduced it from the actual peace profits, which were 30 per cent, to 10 per cent, by taking away two-thirds of his exemption, we have imposed a tax upon that 20 per cent of his peace profits?

But, Mr. President, when we do that, when we impose this tax upon his excessive peace profits by reducing his exemption, as I said, to that extent, does not the tax cease to be a distinctive war-profits tax? It is, indeed, a war-profits tax still, qualified by the fact that there is also an additional tax in the nature of a peace tax, making it a composite war-profits and excess-profits tax. If the taxpayer was making 30 per cent before the war, he is not, under the amendment, permitted to have a reduction of more than 10 per cent, but it does not in any way interfere with taxing his swollen profits since the war; it does not make any difference how much those profits exceed his exemption. If it goes to 500 per cent, we catch it with the highest rate. If it goes to a thousand per cent, we catch it with the highest rate. So we have a combination scheme here in this amendment which imposes indirectly a tax upon the peace profits of a man who was making more than 10 per cent before the war and also retains in its full force and vigor all the provisions of the bill with reference to war profits.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to interrogate him at this point for information?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman if this is an accurate statement of the present condition. In the previous bill presented by the committee, if I understand the chairman and the others, particularly the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge], I have in my mind, the basis was a tax upon war profits as you then estimated it. Subsequently, for reasons satisfactory to the committee, you have now brought in a measure that levies a tax upon all profits without regard to whether they were war profits or profits prior. Therefore instead of the bill cutting off war profits it continues war profits and adds then all other profits.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I mean to say, Mr. President, that by virtue of that change we continue all the provisions of the original amendment with reference to taxing war profits, however high they may reach. We tax the war profits and we tax also indirectly peace profits by not permitting the man to have an exemption to the extent of his peace profits if those profits exceeded 10 per cent upon his invested capital.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator does not regard it as inconsistent to add additional taxes to the primary proposal? He thinks it is perfectly consistent to add additional taxes to the original proposal and he ought not to be charged with any inconsistency because of it?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not think we ought.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Oklahoma means that there is no inconsistency by merely adding to it.

Mr. OWEN. It is no inconsistency to add a tax to the tax previously imposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely not. What I contended in the first speech the Senator from California read from this morning was if this was to be a war-profits tax the exemption should be the total amount earned before the war, however great or however small it might be, because otherwise it would not be a war-profits tax. But when the tax is so imposed as to exempt only a part of the prewar profits where they are supernormal the result is a composite system of war profits and excess profits. It may be and probably is a system which adjusts itself very well to the present situation.

But the Senator from California seems to be laboring under the impression that by reason of making this change we have relieved from tax the swollen war profits against which he loudly declaims. No, Mr. President; we have not abated the tax against them; we have kept the tax and put a new tax upon them in every case where they were making more than 10 per cent before the war. Now, if proof of that fact is needed the Senator gives it in convincing fullness. The Senator says by virtue of this amendment, of this limitation of 10 per cent upon the prewar profits of the big corporations, we have increased the amount of money that will be raised by the Government under the bill $430,000,000. He is correct.

If by that process of placing a limitation upon the exemption based on prewar profits of 10 per cent we have raised this enormous additional amount of revenue—nearly doubled the original amount—in the name of high heaven where will it come from if not from the swollen fortunes of the big corporations that were making supernormal profits before the war and who therefore by reason of large exemptions under the original bill would pay a comparatively small tax?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. Suppose a man invests $100,000 in a factory, buildings, and machinery to manufacture war munitions. He makes a profit of $100,000 and the Government takes 80 per cent of it the first year and the war ceases. Then the man has paid the Government $80,000 out of the war tax and retains $20,000 on an investment which is junk. Such a thing might happen. I am informed that such cases are actually in existence.

Mr. LEWIS. And would happen at the end of the war.

Mr. OWEN. For that reason I understand that the committee has felt justified in not going too far in imposing these taxes, because some allowance must be made for the loss of machinery and building, which will not be available for other purposes after the war.

Mr. LEWIS. But which are necessary now

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement the Senator from Oklahoma makes is correct. It is entirely conceivable that a corporation that is making big profits and now will have to pay these big taxes, especially corporations manufacturing munitions or special supplies for the Government, may, when the war closes, find a good part of their property utterly worthless or worth only a few cents on the dollar.

But, Mr. President, what the Senator from California is asking the Senate to do is not to place a graduated tax upon the individual taxpayers of the country, not to place a tax that will bear lightly upon the man who is making a small profit during the war period and heavily upon the man or the corporation making a big profit, but he proposes that everybody who is making any profits in excess of what they made before the war, without reference as to whether it is 10 per cent more or 500 per cent more, shall pay at identically the same rate, shall pay a flat rate. Your committee thought, and they still think, that these rates ought to be so graduated as to tax profits as they go up, so that the rate becomes higher as the profit goes higher. The rate upon a man who is making only 15 per cent more than he made before the war is 12 per cent under the committee amendment. The rate upon a man who is making 100 per cent more than he did before the war is 30 per cent, and when he makes 300 per cent profit more than before the war we make him pay at the rate of 60 per cent.

But the Senator from California says that is not the right principle. The Senator from California says that the small man, the little man, the man of small and moderate profits, the man whose profits may have not been increased sufficiently above the normal to make his profits more than a moderate earning upon the capital invested, shall pay at the rate of 80 per cent upon those profits, while the great Steel Corporation and munition corporations making three or four or five hundred, some say a thousand, per cent more upon their capital than before the war and because of the war, shall pay at no higher rate than the little fellow.

We have adopted in our amendment the principle upon which our income taxes are imposed. We do not impose a flat income tax upon people. Suppose we imposed the highest rate, which is 67 per cent, upon the man making only $10,000 income, it would be burdensome and oppressive. We do not do that, Mr. President. We wait until the man's income goes beyond the two million mark, and then we say to him, on account of the enormity of the income, you can pay the maximum rate and still be enabled to live and not be pinched or subject to any discomfort by reason of the high levy upon you. That is the principle we have applied in our graduate rates in this bill.

The Senator wants to put 80 per cent on excess profits. That leaves only 20 per cent. Upon that balance of 20 per cent of the corporation he would impose an income ranging as high as 80 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Every little drug store and grocery store in the country would pay 80 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Ah, but the Senator from California said that we were imposing an average rate of only 31 per cent. That is the average of the graduated scale that we have proposed, but the Senator says he is after the big corporations. He is after the great concerns with swollen profits, profits of 400 and 500 hundred per cent. The graduated tax we propose, I will say to the Senator from California, is so adjusted that the man he is after, or claims he is after, will have to pay the maximum rate, namely, 60 per cent, and not the average rate of 31 per cent. So the Senator need not distress himself about the average, if it be true, as he claims that he is after the man with big profits—with swollen profits, to use his words.

Mr. President, the Senator said that I had condemned very vigorously the flat 8 per cent exemption of the House bill. I did, and I still do. Why? Not for the reason the Senator gives. The House rate would not let out of paying the tax anybody who was making 8 per cent before the war and is making since the war. The House bill is not so framed; does not let him escape. When I was talking about letting corporations escape I did not mean the corporation making more than 8 per cent. The Senator knows I did not mean it.

What I was talking about was letting the big corporations that made less than 8 per cent before the war and makes more now, escape. I instanced the railroads. I do not mean to say that every railroad in this country was making less than 8 per cent before the war. A few of them were making a little more than 8 per cent before the war and of course would be caught if making more than that amount now, to some extent by the House bill tax, but the average profit that the railroads were making in this country during the three years immediately preceding war conditions was around 5 per cent.

Under the House bill those making around the average would be let out, for the House bill allows them nearly twice as much exemption as the amount which they were actually making before the war; it doubles their exemption, and manifestly such a railroad would have to nearly double its profit—increase them 100 per cent before it would have to pay any tax.

Mr. President, in fixing our minimum we were particular to avoid that rock. We wanted to give every man the benefit of a reasonable deduction. What did we do? We provided if prewar profit was subnormal the exemption should be at least as much as 6 per cent on the capital employed. Such concerns as the railroads might be helped a little when they were making 5 per cent; but on the whole would have to pay a sharp tax. I am assured by representatives of some of the railroads that the House exemption of 8 per cent would practically let out of tax most railroads in this country. On the other hand it is certain the bill, as we originally reported it and as now amended, would tax these roads in a great many instances heavily. A 6 per cent exemption would not allow the railroads of this country to escape tax—an 8 per cent exemption would. That is the kind of corporation I said the House bill would let out, Mr. President.

Our bill is so framed as not to let that kind of corporation out; not to let the corporation that was making a very small profit before the war escape altogether, as the House rates would permit many of them to do. We want to tax that corporation. That is one end of it.

Having protected the Government against the escape of that class of corporations that were making a relatively small profit before the war, and who under the House bill exemption of 8 per cent might escape these profit taxes—having only protected the Government against the escape of this class of corporations, the corporations making a subnormal profit before the war, we then proceeded in fixing the maximum to prevent the corporations that were making 30 or 40 per cent before the war from escaping the tax to the prejudice of the Treasury of the United States by placing a limitation of 10 per cent and saying to them, "You shall not escape your just share of these expenses because you happened to be making a big profit before the war. We will allow you an exemption from tax as much as 10 per cent on your capital, and all your profits in excess of 10 per cent must pay the tax." So we have gotten the slacker; so we have gotten the corporation which would try to escape these taxes, whether its earnings before the war were subnormal or supernormal.

Mr. President, in conclusion let me say that while I advocate a war-profits tax, I have yielded to a manifest and overwhelming demand that it should be a composite war-profits and excess-profits tax.

Mr. JAMES. Let us vote, Mr. President.

Mr. PENROSE. Vote!

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Fall	James	Knox
Borah	Fernald	Johnson, Cal.	Lewis
Brady	Fletcher	Johnson, S. Dak.	Lodge
Brandeggee	France	Jones, N. Mex.	McKellar
Broussard	Frelinghuysen	Jones, Wash.	McNary
Calder	Gronna	Kellogg	Martin
Chamberlain	Hale	Kendrick	Myers
Colt	Harding	Kenyon	Nelson
Curtis	Hollis	King	New
Dillingham	Husting	Kirby	Norris

Overman	Saulsbury	Smith, Md.	Townsend
Page	Shafroth	Smith, S. C.	Underwood
Penrose	Sheppard	Smoot	Vardaman
Phelan	Sherman	Sterling	Wadsworth
Pomerene	Shields	Stone	Watson
Robinson	Simmons	Thompson	Williams

Mr. TOWNSEND. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has been called from the Chamber on official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. BORAH, Mr. JOHNSON of California, and Mr. SIMMONS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll. The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. By an arrangement with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is necessarily absent on account of illness, to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] has a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. By an arrangement between us, the Senator from Wyoming will stand paired with the Senator from Montana. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED's name was called). I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. REED] has been absent from the city for several days, and will be absent for several days more, on very important business which necessitates his absence. He is paired, as has been stated, with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was called). I again announce the temporary absence of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Michigan]. He has been called from the Senate on official business. He is paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. MARTIN (when Mr. SWANSON's name was called). My colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is unavoidably absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when the name of Mr. THOMAS was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness, and to state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. TILLMAN's name was called). Permit me to announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] because of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. He is absent, but I am reliably informed that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is absent on account of official business. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, I understand, if present would vote the same way as I shall on this question. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BECKHAM. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I am requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] on account of illness, and he instructs me to say that if he were present he would vote with the committee, and would therefore vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I am requested to announce the absence of the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

I also desire to announce that the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. Goff] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. Tillman].

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—17.

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of California to the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment reported by the committee it is proposed to strike out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words "72 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I propose to discuss first the war-profits tax generally; then I shall submit some observations as to the amendment which has been offered by the committee, and then say a word about the amendment which I have offered.

WAR-PROFITS TAX.

Mr. President, the war-profits tax rests upon the fact that many lines of business are making unheard-of and inordinate profits out of the war. That these profits should be heavily taxed for the purpose of paying the expenses of the war is a proposition so obviously just that no sane person would undertake to dispute it. I am not discussing now the difficulties of ascertaining what are strictly war profits and what are not, but assume that this bill provides a way in which it can be determined with reasonable accuracy what profits are "war profits." I say that no man in his right mind would undertake to dispute the justice of the plan that those profits should be taxed heavily to pay the expenses of the war, out of which they are made.

It would be a reproach to our present civilization if we failed to prevent, so far as we have the power, one class of our citizens, comparatively small, from becoming enormously rich out of this war, while the other and much larger class was impoverished by the war. We can not prevent the injustice and the inequality of the burdens which every war causes to the people of a country engaged in it. It is bound to be true of this war, as it is of every war, that some will sacrifice everything—life, health, and property—in the support of the war, and that others will gain immeasurably through the war. When any man discovers a remedy for this result of war he will have discovered the secret of everlasting peace among nations. When any plan is discovered by which the sacrifices of the war must be borne equally by all, the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, the rulers and those ruled over—when that plan is discovered, I say that there will be no more war.

We can not in this or any other revenue bill which we may devise even approximately equalize the financial burdens of this war, but we can, at least, refuse to set our approval upon a scheme which would deliberately recognize and legalize the grossest possible injustice in the distribution of those burdens.

It is a proposition which seems to me must be shocking to the moral sense of every man that some of our people shall be in receipt of incomes of thousands, hundreds of thousands, or millions of dollars purely as a result of this war, while millions of our people, as a result of it, are suffering privation and want. About these general principles there will be no dispute—there can be no dispute about them among humane and civilized men. It only remains to be seen what bearing the provisions of this bill have upon these principles.

Briefly and generally stated, Title II of this bill, which we are now considering, when it came before the Senate from the Finance Committee, and in the form in which it has been before the Senate for several weeks, proposed that the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 should be designated as the prewar period, and that the war profits of any trade or business for the taxable year shall be determined by deducting from the net income of the business for the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period. And to the war profits so determined a graduated tax was applied, beginning with a rate of 12 per cent on an amount not exceeding 15 per cent of the prewar profits, and advancing the rate of the tax as the war profits increased, according to the schedules provided in the bill. In other words, Title II of this bill provided originally simply for a tax on war profits.

That the application of such a law will be attended with some difficulty must be admitted, but the principle of it can, I believe, be applied and the purpose of the law to a large extent be accomplished.

Any system to reach war profits, excess incomes, or great wealth in any form and subject it to substantial taxation is attended with difficulty. The Government will have, however, in administering this law the income-tax returns of the various corporations of the country since 1909, and with this and other data which the Government has at its disposal I do not anticipate any extraordinary difficulty in determining with reasonable accuracy war profits, and subjecting them to taxation.

The practical question is what proportion of war profits shall be taken to help pay for this war. The chairman of the Finance Committee has estimated that the war profits for the fiscal year will amount to $3,000,000,000. The majority report in Table C attached thereto estimates that the war-profits tax will yield $562,000,000 additional revenue. The chairman of the Finance Committee also tells us that to that amount should be added $226,000,000, the estimated amount which would be produced by the munition manufacturers' tax, provided for in Title III of the act of September 8, 1916, and by the 8 per cent excess-profits tax provided for in the act of March 3, 1917. If this amount is added, then it makes the estimated amount of the tax to be raised by this bill as it originally came before the Senate $788,000,000, instead of $562,000,000, as stated in the report accompanying the bill. The two last-mentioned acts, however, are to be repealed according to the provisions of this bill. There is no statement in the majority report indicating that it was estimated that $788,000,000 would be produced under this bill and the acts it is proposed to repeal. I say this because the questions addressed me while I have been speaking upon this bill indicate that there has been a good deal of confusion in the minds of various Senators upon this point. I think that confusion was very natural under the circumstances.

A still greater element of confusion has now been injected into the situation by the amendment of August 29, brought in by the Finance Committee. It is claimed for that amendment that it will raise substantially more revenue. I shall not at this time stop to discuss it in detail, but I merely point out at this time that it changes fundamentally the principle of the bill and adopts in one particular at least the principle of the House bill, which was strongly condemned by the Finance Committee. Moreover by far the greater amount of the revenue which it is claimed this amendment will produce does not arise from a tax on war profits at all. This amendment, among other things, proposes to change the method of determining "war profits" for taxation purposes. It adds a provision to the method of determining "war profits" above described to the effect that the deduction allowed for prewar profits shall not be less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the actual capital invested on January 1 of the taxable year, so that under this amendment the first thing to do in order to determine the profits to which the war-tax rate is to be applied, is to ascertain the actual invested capital, as of January 1 of the taxable year.

It was the difficulty, and, as the Finance Committee regarded it, the apparently insurmountable difficulty of determining the actual invested capital that led to the rejection in this respect of the House plan. I had supposed until this amendment came in from the majority Members of the Finance Committee that it was one of the principal merits of the Senate bill that it avoided the necessity of taking up this question of capitalization at all.

I may say, Mr. President, that for 8 or 10 weeks the Finance Committee came back again and again to the question of incorporating in this bill any provision that would require the capitalization of corporations to be computed by the Secretary of the Treasury; and again and again, and scores of times, the committee solemnly decided that under no circumstances would the bill as reported impose upon the Secretary of the Treasury the necessity of ascertaining the capitalization of corporations.

The reason for that is obvious. There can be no ascertainment of the true capitalization of a corporation without making an inventory of its physical properties, and ascertaining the true, fair value of the property of the corporation.

It was again and again stated in the committee that the Secretary of the Treasury would be driven in every case to accept the capitalization shown by the books of the corporation. Everyone knows—the merest novice, not to say any student of this great subject—that the book value of corporations does not represent the actual investment in the business, but it represents in many, and, perhaps, in all, cases a very large element of fictitious capitalization. That fictitious capitalization it is impossible to eliminate, unless, as I said a moment ago, there be conducted through the agency of trained experts a real test by making an inventory of the properties of the corporation. The majority of the committee, after having faced that question for 10 weeks or more and having rejected that idea again and again and again, decided that it would adopt a basis that would relieve the Secretary of the Treasury of undertaking an altogether impossible task.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Is there any difference now between the House bill and the bill and amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance other than the fact that the House fixed an arbitrary 8 per cent and the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina allows it to swing between 6 and 10 per cent? In both instances must you not necessarily go back and fix the amount of the capital before you can begin to estimate the profits?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; before you can apply your rate per cent at all. I am just stating that the Finance Committee of the Senate decided scores of times that that was an impossible task.

Why, Mr. President, they sought for a little time in their early deliberations to find some formula of words that would eliminate the fictitious element from the capitalization of corporations. They had before the committee Dr. Taussig, one of the most eminent economists in the world, not once, but scores of times, working early and late to frame some definition which could be adopted by the committee and incorporated in this bill which would, so to speak, squeeze the water out of the overcapitalization of these corporations. He submitted again and again the best form of amendment which his training and his genius could enable him to frame to meet that question. The committee, after considering again and again the many amendments suggested by Dr. Taussig, the head of the Tariff Commission—and always submitted with the statement that they were imperfect—decided that it was next to impossible to perform that task and rejected all the suggested amendments.

The committee decided that the invested capital could only be determined by an investigation by experts of the real value of the property of the corporation. The committee, as the result of many weeks' consideration of that subject, solemnly and with the utmost deliberation, framed this bill as reported by the committee upon this point for the express purpose of getting rid of that troublesome question. Then, all of a sudden, driven by the assaults made upon this bill during the course of the debate and the manifest determination of the Senate, supported by a growing public opinion that began to make itself felt even in the confines of this body, that committee called a hasty meeting and in one hour framed and adopted the amendment reported, entirely changing the result of their many weeks of deliberation and accepting as the basis of capitalization the showing made by the books of the corporation—for that is what it amounts to.

I am aware that there is a paragraph in this bill which refers the matter to the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not wish to speak in disparagement of the committee in any way, but it simply shifts the responsibility onto the Secretary of the Treasury. Everybody knows that the Secretary of the Treasury can make no investigation into the capitalizations of the corporations of this country in order to enforce this tax.

Why, sir, the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the authority conferred upon it by an act of Congress, has spent five years already and many millions of dollars, with an army of experts, in making a careful survey of the railroads of this country and an inventory of all their physical properties for the purpose of determining the true value of same. After years of discussion Congress determined that the only way to ascertain the actual value of railroad property was to employ experts having a knowledge of the values of such property and appraise the same. Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission, with a force of hundreds and hundreds of the trained experts, have spent five years upon that subject, and have only completed in a tentative way the valuation of two or three of the small railroads of the country. They have done a great deal of work upon the other railroads, but it is accepted as a fact that it will take several years to finish this great undertaking and arrive at a tentative result as to the capital actually invested and employed in the railroad business of this country. And, mark you, under the amendment which the committee has proposed the Secretary of the Treasury in less than one year must determine not only the invested capital of the railroads but the invested capital of all of the other corporations of the country as well.

In the face of these facts, which everyone knows to be true, it is a mockery to pretend that the Secretary of the Treasury could, with many times his present force, within the period of one year scratch even the surface of such a prodigious undertaking. Sir, the committee knows very well that the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to take the report of the corporation as to its invested capital—water and all.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. KENYON. In view of the important facts the Senator is now giving the Senate, it seems to me that there should be more Senators present; so I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gronna	Myers	Sheppard
Borah	Hale	Nelson	Sherman
Brady	Husting	New	Shields
Brandegge	James	Newlands	Simmons
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Colt	Kellogg	Page	Smith, Mich.
Culberson	Kendrick	Penrose	Smoot
Curtis	Kenyon	Phelan	Stone
Fall	King	Poinlexter	Thompson
Fernald	Kirby	Pomerene	Vardaman
Fletcher	Knox	Ransdell	Wadsworth
France	La Follette	Robinson	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Lewis	Saulsbury	Williams
Gerry	McKellar	Shafroth

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is detained by illness in his family.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in view of the labors of the Committee on Finance upon this proposition, I had supposed, until this amendment came in from the majority members of that committee, that it was one of the principal merits of the Senate bill that it avoided the necessity of taking up this question of capitalization at all. In the majority report accompanying the bill, after referring to the House plan of taxation, which involved the determination of the amount of the capital actually invested, it is said:

The fundamental difficulty in assessing a tax on these lines arises from the difficulty of establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested. The House bill endeavors to overcome this difficulty by a proviso designed to prevent inflated valuation of good will and the like intangible assets. To be reckoned as actual capital, the House bill requires that their value must be established or accredited through their being paid for "in cash."

The words "in cash" are quoted, because the framers of the majority report knew that the entry upon the books "paid for in cash" is largely a fiction, resorted to for the purpose of covering up false and fraudulent overcapitalization.

The majority then proceeds to say:

But provisions of this kind, designed to prevent inflation of capitalization, are usually of little real effect. Indeed, it is doubtful whether they can in any way be framed so as to be effective. Payments for good will and other intangible assets can easily be made to appear on the books of a corporation to have been made in cash. Almost always they are made so to appear.

Still reading from the report submitted by the chairman of the Finance Committee—

This familiar way of watering the stocks of corporations is impossible to detect and counteract without a specific examination of the precise facts in each case. Such an examination, if made for all concerns of every size and kind, as the House bill contemplates, must necessarily extend over a long period of time; it must be made in an enormous number of cases; it must lead to dispute and contest; and must be productive of unlimited litigation.

In those unmeasured terms did the majority of the Committee on Finance of the Senate denounce the plan which they have now adopted, and adopted at one session of the committee that lasted for less than an hour.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator how much consideration was given by the committee to the first plan?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say in answer to the interrogatory of the Senator from Iowa that it was not less than 10 weeks, for the committee had this subject under consideration for that time, and this was continually coming up day by day and recurrence was had to it. Not once, not a dozen times, but scores of times the Finance Committee put the stamp of its disapproval upon the very plan that is now before the Senate reported from that committee with approval.

Mr. President, I will have a word to say about the effect of this amendment which has been reported in exempting certain of the great corporations of the country from the taxes which they ought to pay as war-profits taxes even by the terms of the amendment submitted.

I have concluded the quotation from the majority report.

These objections seemed to me unanswerable when they were made against the House bill by the chairman of the Finance Committee in the majority report, but I fail to see why they are not equally conclusive when made against this amendment. Does not the provision of this amendment, which makes it necessary to determine the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year, make this law as a practical matter unworkable? Such an examination must lead to long-drawn-out contests and withholding of taxes or else result in compromises whereby the Government will get much less than it ought receive.

I understand the chairman of the Finance Committee to admit the force of this argument, but to say that they have tried to meet this objection by the following provision found in the amendment as subdivision (d) of section 203:

If the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to determine the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period or the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year, the war profits shall be determined as provided in subdivision (a) of section 204.

I wish Senators would take this amendment and follow me as I proceed with the analysis.

Now, subdivision (a) of section 204 merely provides for determining the amount of the war profits in those exceptional cases where the person or corporation in question had no net income from the trade or business during the prewar period or where the corporation was not in existence during that period, and in such case the experience of representative corporations and individuals engaged in a like or similar business is resorted to; but the war profits of these representative corporations or individuals are determined as provided in section 203. By this process you are simply led back to the starting point.

Section 204 (a) furnishes a rule merely to determine the war profits of those persons or concerns who were not engaged in business or had no profits during the prewar period, but it presupposes the ability to determine the war profits of the representative concerns whose experience is to be adopted as the means of determining the war profits of those persons and concerns who were not engaged in business or made no profits during the prewar period. Section 204 (a) does not involve the question of capitalization at all. The point against this amendment is the same as that against the House bill, namely, that where you are dealing with individuals and concerns that were in business during the prewar period and had profits during the prewar period it must lead to endless dispute and protracted litigation to determine the amount of capital invested as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Then, again, according to the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee, most of the additional revenue which they claim will be raised under this amendment will not be raised as a result of a tax upon war profits at all. Out of the $498,000,000 additional revenue which it is claimed will be raised by this amendment only about $70,000,000, according to the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee, will be derived from the new bracket levying 60 per cent upon the excess war profits. All the balance which it is claimed can be raised—an amount over $400,000,000—will be raised not by a tax upon war profits but by a tax based upon the amount of average normal income during the prewar period less the allowance provided in this amendment of 10 per cent upon the invested capital.

Now, it may well be that these concerns which were making huge profits before the war should be taxed on account of such profits which they continue to make during the taxable year of the war, but it should be understood that such tax is in no sense a war-profits tax, and the levying of such tax should not excuse such persons or concerns from paying a proper and just tax upon their war profits.

This amendment does not, therefore, represent at all the tax on war profits, except the $70,000,000 before referred to, though it will, if it produces the result claimed for it, increase by something less than $500,000,000 the amount of revenue to be produced by the bill. This additional revenue will be derived from the tax upon the net profits of those concerns which were making immense prewar profits, and is obtained because they are allowed to deduct only an amount equal to 10 per cent of their capital from the net income of the taxable year instead of deducting therefrom their total average net prewar profits. That over $400,000,000 can be obtained in taxes by applying the low rates provided in this bill to the amount of prewar profits after taking out an amount equal to 10 per cent of capital invested is proof that these concerns were making tremendous prewar profits and furnishes the strongest possible argument for raising the rates of taxation on war profits. The business that was so thoroughly established and so completely successful before the war that its average prewar profits far exceeded annually 10 per cent of its invested capital can hardly be injured by any amount which the Government may take in taxation of those profits in excess of that amount, which constitutes the war profit. By this amendment and by the results which the committee claim for it it seems to me we are furnished with the strongest possible reason for advancing the rates of the war-profits tax.

It must be remembered also that the figure $788,000,000 stated by the chairman of the Finance Committee as the amount it was expected to raise from the war-tax provision of this bill before the amendment just considered was brought in does not by any means represent war taxes. I submit that $266,000,000 of that amount—being the amount which it is claimed will be produced in taxes by the law which this bill proposes to repeal—can not be fairly assumed to represent an amount of taxation levied for war purposes.

There can be no doubt that even if we had not gone into this war the income tax upon corporations would not have been suffered to remain at 2 per cent, nor would the munition manufacturers' tax and the excess profits tax on corporations, at 8 per cent, have been repealed. These taxes or certainly a very large part of them would have been required to help pay the running expenses of the Government even if there had been no war, so that the tax upon incomes of corporations and the war-profits tax provided for in this bill must be understood as containing some element of peace-time taxation, as well as taxation to meet war expenses. In other words, the tax to be levied under this title of the bill is not wholly a burden which is incident to the war, but a part of it represents a tax which those subject to it must have paid if we had remained at peace.

But passing all these questions for the time being, I invite your attention to the real and fundamental question to be considered.

WHAT PROPORTION OF WAR PROFITS SHALL BE TAKEN BY TAXATION?

That question is what proportion of war profits shall be taken by taxation during the present taxable year. The method by which the amount of war profits is ascertained, and the manner in which the tax is levied and collected are only important as means to an end. The means must be adapted to accomplish the end, not to defeat it, and for that reason there are many particulars in which this bill should be amended. I believe it should be amended so as to eliminate that provision recently injected into it by the majority of the Finance Committee, making it necessary to determine the amount of invested capital of corporations. That principle was repudiated by every member of the Finance Committee after it had been thoroughly discussed and considered for many weeks in the committee. I have heard nothing in explanation of the eleventh-hour change upon this subject by the majority members of the Finance Committee which changes the opinion I had previously formed upon that question—an opinion which was held also by every member of the Finance Committee. I believe that the bill should be amended so that the billions of dollars of surplus accumulated by the great corporations of the country should not be allowed to escape taxation nor be reckoned as a part of the capital for the purpose of increasing the amount of net income exempt from taxation. I believe the penalties in this bill should be greater. Since the returns which the corporations make must of necessity be accepted in most cases as the basis of taxation, it is in the highest degree important that those returns should be correct, and whatever severe penalties can do to insure that correctness should be done. The penalties in this bill are simply ridiculous. I observe, for instance, that the penalty for refusing or neglecting to make a return or to supply information required under this bill is a fine of not less than $20 nor more than $1,000. In the name of common decency let us make the penalties for evasion of the tax law as severe as we have the penalties for evasion of the draft law.

It may be insisted that some of the penalties in the old law will be added to the penalties here. I say that by the terms of this bill the matter is left in utter confusion as to that, and no lawyer can tell how the courts would construe these penalties, or which should supersede the other or whether they should be combined.

Think of it! Is it a more serious offense for a father or mother to evade the draft law to save the life of their boy or to save him from the fate of taking the life of some other parents' boy than it is for the millionaire to evade the tax law in order to save the dollars he has wrung out of the cruel conditions of this war?

But, as I say, I purpose to subordinate all these questions for the present at least to the main inquiry. What proportion of war profits should the Government take for the present taxable year to help defray the expenses of this war? The majority of the Finance Committee has come forward with a proposition which, after all the increases they have been forced to make since this bill came into the Senate, still proposes to take by taxation this year only about one-quarter of war profits to pay war expenses. Is the Senate ready to stand for that proposition? Do you think the country is ready to stand for it? Do you think the people of the country will give even perfunctory support to this war if that unjust proposition is written into the law?

That this bill even as now amended by the Finance Committee to substantially increase the war-profits tax over the amount originally proposed will still leave untouched about three-fourths of those profits is shown upon the face of figures presented.

Mr. President, I pause for one moment to say this: As the bill was first reported to the Senate it so protected the profits derived from war that it shielded the surplus incomes of the rich, and, imputing no wrongful motive to any member of the majority of that committee, it does put the Senate upon its inquiry as to the terms of any proposition contained in this bill. From my point of view the bill as reported and as it would work out, I do not say as it was intended by the majority to work out in its administration but as it would have been administered, dealt so carefully with war profits and big incomes that the committee was humiliated by having the Senate, with a few days of deliberation upon the bill, practically take it out of the committee's hands, set aside the recommendation of the committee, and raise, on roll calls here, the income tax by $70,000,000 additional. That was adding a pretty big per cent to the amount the committee had reported out after 10 weeks' deliberation. By your own act you, Senators, after looking for a few days at the work of this committee, set it aside as to income taxes, and without having yet concluded action upon the income tax you have already added about $70,000,000 to the income taxes over what this bill proposed to raise. Nay, more than that, this body put its disapproval upon the bill by cutting out of it by a vote with a very considerable majority—I do not remember the exact figures—at one sweep $50,000,000 that it was proposed by the committee to put on the people of this country in the shape of 3-cent postage stamps instead of 2-cent postage stamps, saving thereby $50,000,000 that otherwise would have had to have been paid out of the incomes and war profits. When the Senate had given a few days' consideration to the subject—indeed, I do not think that the first-class postal rate was debated here more than a day, less than a day, in fact—by a decisive vote of 39 to 29 this committee provision was stricken from the bill by the Senate.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], responding to a question asked by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], says that in view of the increased estimates and in view of the criticism of one feature of the bill with regard to corporations that had the high profits in the prewar period, the committee took the bill back and changed it in that regard. The Senator from Pennsylvania very well knows that the committee had all the information about increased estimates before they reported the bill out that they have now.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment. When the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee and informed the committee that there would have to be additional revenue provided to meet at least $5,000,000,000 of additional estimates, the committee took up the careful consideration of the information thus submitted to it. It endeavored by calling before it the heads of every bureau and division of the War Department, from which most of those estimates came, and subjecting the heads of the departments to the most crucial examination, to see if there could not be eliminated from that $5,000,000,000 a very considerable amount that would not be required to be expended in this fiscal year. As I sat as a member of that committee during that investigation I supposed, of course, it was conducted for the purpose of adding to the bill all of the $5,000,000,000 estimated to meet expenditures which could not be deferred beyond the end of the fiscal year, or at least such a proportion of the $5,000,000,000 as would very greatly increase the total amount of taxes to be provided in the bill. The most searching and thorough examination of those experts disclosed the fact that out of the total $5,000,000,000 there could not be by any means and process of reasoning found an amount in excess of $400,000,000 which might possibly not be required during the present fiscal year. But, nevertheless, the committee shifted its ground and brought in this bill in the face of all that testimony, with only the paltry addition of some $300,000,000. As first reported, as I remember it, it was something over $1,800,000,000, and as last reported it was $2,000,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in this connection I suggest a matter to the Senator that is troubling me, or at least I have been unable to find a satisfactory reason for it to my mind. In the majority report accompanying the bill they give a financial statement on page 2 in which it is stated that the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 are $5,693,958,000. It has been suggested in this discussion, and was referred to just a moment ago, that they did not have information in reference to the additional needs of the Treasury Department until after the bill was reported. I have wondered whether the minority had information that the majority did not have, because I find on page 95 of the minority report a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in which he gives the estimated expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 as $10,735,807,000, instead of $5,693,958,000 as set out on page 2 of the majority report. And yet I see when I read that letter from the Secretary of the Treasury that it is addressed to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it was presented by the chairman of the committee to the committee; it was before the committee. More than that, the Secretary of the Treasury appeared in person before the committee and stated that, in addition to the $5,000,000,000 estimate that had previously been made when the bill was in the House, it would be necessary to have revenues from some source to meet an additional $5,000,000,000 called for by one department, that of the Secretary of War. Then, Mr. President, the question naturally arose in committee, Will there be estimates in addition to this $5,000,000,000 from other departments? The committee, therefore, adopted a resolution asking the Secretary of the Treasury to determine that question and to report to the committee.

So, Mr. President, when the committee subsequently met it had before it the estimates gathered by the Secretary of the Treasury, not only the estimates from the War Department but from other departments. The committee, as a whole, of course, has had precisely the same information that the minority members of the committee had.

The minority, in its report, did state to the Senate that the $3,000,000,000 that had been authorized as a bond issue to provide money for the foreign governments that are receiving money from the Treasury of the United States, according to such information as the members of the minority committee could gather, would be entirely inadequate to meet the demands of those foreign governments during the present fiscal year; that the rate at which money was being advanced to the allied governments, which was as fast as their commissions could come here and ask for it, if continued throughout the fiscal year, would, in the aggregate, bring the amount to between six billion and seven billion dollars instead of three billion dollars and that an additional amount of something like four billion dollars would have to be provided for either by taxation or by bond issue within this fiscal year if the requirements of the allied nations were met.

Sir, the report submitted by the minority had scarcely been placed before the Senate when there came from the Treasury Department official announcement that there would be a call made upon Congress for a provision of $4,000,000,000, added to the $3,000,000,000 already authorized, in order to provide for the demands of the allies for the present fiscal year, confirming almost to the last figure the statement made in the minority report. Since that time more demands have been coming; the demands have been growing; and we are pushing on rapidly toward passing, by a very considerable amount, the twenty billion dollar mark for the present fiscal year for all purposes.

I know, Mr. President, that both Houses of Congress are very largely constrained to accept the recommendations of committees in legislation. The subjects which both Houses of Congress must consider are now very numerous and are multiplying rapidly. The exactions made upon the members of all committees of Congress are very burdensome, and when one of the leading committees of Congress reports a great measure here it is natural, if not necessary, that in large degree Senators accept the views and recommendations of the committee; but, Mr. President, we are confronted with an extraordinary situation now. There is a struggle on that everybody must recognize between accumulated wealth and the great masses of the people of this country. Shall we close our eyes to the experience of all governments of all the earth in all great wars? We know that it is always the effort of wealth to pay as little of the expenses of war by taxes as possible, to throw as much of it into bond issues as possible. Wealth makes profit out of bond issues; wealth should bear in proportion to its vast accumulations the burdens of taxation. Hence it is always the determined effort of wealth in all wars to cut down the taxation to the lowest limit, to provide for as much of the war cost as possible by bond issues, to reap the profits that wealth always seeks in investments of that sort, and to escape the taxes that wealth would have to pay under the legitimate and proper rule of paying according to ability. We have here now before the Congress of the United States what has confronted every nation on earth since time began when it was at war. We have the wealth of this country struggling in a determined way to cut the taxation down, and where taxation can not be avoided to put as much of it as possible on to the mass of the people in the form of consumption taxes, and to put as much of the cost of the war as is possible into bond issues, thus to save the wealth of the country from taxation and allow it to make profits out of its loans to the Government. Are we to close our eyes to the facts of history? Are we to forget our own dire experience in other wars? Have we not an exemplification of that contest in this bill as reported by the majority of the committee and opposed by the minority?

With the utmost respect for the individual members of the majority of the committee, I say that the committee has been driven step by step by the Senate itself refusing—and that is unusual—to follow, as the Senate and the House are usually compelled to do with closed eyes, the lead of the committee in this particular. In this exceptional and stressful time that precedent has been broken, and the committee has been forced backward, step by step, from the position that it has taken; some of the taxes upon the necessities of the people have been cut out of the bill and rejected already, and some of those remaining are likely to be treated in the same way. Income taxes were increased over the protests of the committee; the committee fled to its committee room with the bill and in one hour brought in a report which proposes to double the amount of money it was proposed originally should be exacted from the corporations, not entirely as a war-profits tax but as a combination of a war-profits and excess-profits tax, and also abandons the principle of war-profits taxation originally laid down in the bill. So, I say, it behooves Members of the Senate with respect to this new proposition which is presented, in view of the history of this bill in the Senate, to scan it carefully and to form their own judgment as the public will form its judgment.

The public, Mr. President, when it considers the relation of the amount raised by taxes and by borrowings and the sources from which the taxes will be raised, will not be blindly led by the precedents that prevail in both branches of Congress to shut their eyes and follow a committee.

I am not here to suggest that anybody shall blindly follow the minority or any of its suggestions, but I am here to say, in the face of this record, that, on the issues raised between the majority and the minority, every Member of this body is constrained, or he ought to be, to sift out for himself the facts which should lead him to act in this matter for the interests of his State and country. I submit, Senators, that now you are called to act upon a subject of great moment to your States—one of the most momentous that has ever been dealt with by the Congress since the origin of the Government—and in determining your course you should not follow blindly any committee or any portion of any committee, but you should ascertain the facts and be guided solely by these facts, without partisan or other bias.

When this bill was first presented by the chairman of the Finance Committee it was accompanied by the estimate that the war profits for the taxable year would amount to $3,000,000,000. When the amendment which I have briefly discussed was presented by the chairman of the Finance Committee, on August 29, it was accompanied by the estimate of the Treasury expert that the taxable profits for 1917 would amount to $4,100,000,000. Some of this amount, as I have briefly shown, might be more properly called excess peace-time profits than war profits if the theory of the majority of the Finance Committee is correct. If we confine the estimates strictly to war profits, then the tax on war profits will yield, according to this bill, assuming that the majority of the committee are correct in their theories and calculations, $562,000,000 plus $70,000,000—derived from the new 6 per cent bracket on war profits—or $632,000,000, which is $118,000,000 less than one-fourth of the $3,000,000,000 of estimated war profits.

Even if you add to this amount the entire $226,000,000 which the majority of the committee estimate would be raised under the laws this bill proposes to repeal, and which does not really represent the proceeds of a war-profits tax, the total amount would be only $108,000,000 in excess of 25 per cent of the estimated $3,000,000,000 for war profits. If you take the latter estimate of $4,100,000,000 of war profits which the committee has submitted and add the entire $498,000,000 which the chairman of the Finance Committee claims will be added to the revenue by his last amendment, it does not substantially alter the proportions. The "additional revenue" is $1,060,000,000, according to the figures submitted by the chairman of the committee when he offered the amendment of August 29, as the amount to be yielded by this bill, and is only a trifle more than one-fourth of the estimated $4,100,000,000 of war profits, which is the last estimate submitted by the majority members of the committee.

Remember that the war profits are simply the abnormal profits due to the war. They are the profits made as a result of the war over and above the normal profits. If the net profits of a concern for the prewar period amounted to 7 per cent or 10 per cent or any other per cent, the corporation is entitled, under the provisions of this bill, to that same amount of profit untouched by the war-profits tax, except as provided by the committee amendment, the deduction for a war profit shall not be less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the invested capital. The stockholder will first draw his dividend upon the basis of normal profits, ranging from 6 to 10 per cent; salaries and expenses, overhead charges, depreciation, and all that will all be paid, and if nothing is left above that the Government gets nothing by taxation under this bill. It is only the profits in excess of all this—the abnormal profits, the super profits—that it is proposed to levy the war tax upon, and this bill seriously proposes to start that tax at only 12 per cent of these war profits, increasing it as the amount of war profits increases, until even, according to this last amendment of the majority of the committee, it is proposed to take merely 60 per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed the normal profits by 300 per cent.

SOME PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS.

Mr. President, it must always be remembered that the mass of people have to pay the prices which war profits entail. As always, the people pay. It makes no difference whether the demand for the products of a steel manufacturer, or for any other commodity, comes from our Government or from a foreign government, the people of this country have to bid against that demand for the product. The price immediately rises and is passed along for our ultimate consumer to pay. It may be in increased rent or in the increased price of food, fuel, or other necessities of subsistence; it may be in the increased price of farm machinery, but it must be paid; and the man who pays it must pay the excessive prices which this Government and foreign governments in competition for that product force constantly to the highest limit.

Then, again, labor never gets its fair share, or rather its peace-time share which is never fair, out of the production of war materials. The prices for the product jump long before there is an appreciable increase in wages. This is another reason why war profits should for purposes of taxation be treated entirely different from wealth in any other form. Again, precisely because the war profits which it is proposed to reach by taxation in this bill are abnormal profits, arising from abnormal causes, substantially all of them might be taken by the Government in taxation without disturbing normal business conditions, providing only that all kinds of business producing war profits are treated the same. Suppose a concern was engaged in a business before the war paying a net profit of 7 per cent on investment. Suppose as a result of the war this net profit is doubled. Suppose that 80 per cent of the war profits were taken by taxation, the business would still have the same net income that it would have had if war had not occurred, and 20 per cent added to it. Surely 7 per cent net profit, plus 20 per cent war profits, plus the spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice which distinguishes our corporations and business concerns, would be sufficient to keep that business going at its utmost capacity during the war. If the spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice should wane a little, it is still pretty safe to say that the financial returns mentioned would be sufficient to keep the enterprise in operation, particularly if there was no war-profit enterprise to turn to which was not being taxed in the same way.

Now, there is another consideration which should have a persuasive and, indeed, almost controlling effect upon our action in fixing the rate at this time of the war-profits tax, and that is the uncertainty concerning the length of the war. Either the war will last through the year or it will not. If it does last through the year, then every dollar that we have failed to collect in war taxes for the year is gone and lost to the Government forever, so far as war profits are concerned. The result will be that we will have saddled the people of this country with a $8,000,000,000 debt—and certain to be many billion dollars additional, according to the latest estimates—for them to pay, while the individuals and concerns engaged in the lines of business producing war profits will have made and pocketed hundreds of millions and probably billions of dollars in such profits.

If the war does not end within the year, then it is certain that we will be in dire need of every dollar that we could have raised from war profits to meet the appalling bill of expenses which will then confront us. In either event and from either point of view, whether the war ends suddenly or continues indefinitely, the logic is inexorable which commands us to take from war profits at the present time the largest amount possible.

Ah, but it is said if we levy a heavy tax on war profits we will interfere with business. We will prevent expansion and cripple production, and so decrease the war tax to be collected in the future—in short, to use a homely phrase, that we will kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

There is one very excellent test which we can apply to this argument, and that is the experience of England. England started out in the present war with a 50 per cent tax on war profits, very soon raised it to 60 per cent, and has now raised it to 80 per cent. Furthermore, she requires those engaged in commerce by sea to pay a war-profits tax of 88 per cent.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. PENROSE. I presume the Senator wants to be strictly accurate, as usual, and he ought to make reference there to the fact that England permits a deduction of 10 per cent; in other words, her base line is very much higher than ours.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; that is true; but her tax line, as compared with the committee's, is 80 per cent on all war profits.

Mr. PENROSE. After deducting 10 per cent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. After deducting 10 per cent; that is true; while the committee's is 31½ per cent. Furthermore, Mr. President, on top of this, the prime minister of England is already discussing an advance on their war-profits tax on all business to 95 per cent. Besides that, she taxes incomes after they reach $12,500 an ordinary or normal tax of 25 per cent, and then adds upon that a supertax, so that when those incomes reach $50,000 the two taxes combined amount to 42½ per cent. We have as compared to their normal income-tax rate of 25 per cent a normal tax rate of 2 per cent. At the very beginning, England's war-profits tax was practically double the rate now proposed in this bill.

That is, when you get your 31 per cent you get it by using a factor that is not exclusively a war-profits tax. If you limit it to war-profits tax, it is just a trifle over 25 per cent, or one-half of the amount England levied as a war-profits tax the first year of the war and kept only a few months, when she raised it to 60 per cent.

That this rate of tax upon war profits and the very heavy English income taxes have not discouraged but rather accelerated production in that country is manifest from an examination of the figures showing profits made by the corporations of the country for war and prewar years. In addition, it also appears that the tax is all too small even at the present time to satisfy the demand of the masses of the people as well as English economists.

From the New Statesman, a high-class, progressive English publication, of May 5, 1917, I quote the following:

Mr. Bonar Law's first budget was received with almost universal satisfaction among the one-tenth of the population whom we allow to own nine-tenths of the wealth of the nation—with the single exception of the shipowners, who can not escape the feeling that they are being hardly treated in not being allowed to reap for themselves their own special golden harvest from the war. It is true that all those drawing incomes in excess of £2,000 a year are to continue to pay income tax at the rate of 5 shillings in the pound, whilst those among them who have over £3,000 a year will continue to pay the extraordinarily light additional supertax of a shilling or two in the pound. But we are still a long way from calling upon even the richest millionaires to contribute in the greatest national emergency that the country has ever known that "half your incomes," of which a former financial secretary of the treasury (Mr. Montagu) spoke, still less the "80 per cent" of their incomes which so moderate an economist as Lord Courtney a long time ago suggested.

These wealthy families are not being taxed in accordance with Adam Smith's celebrated canons of taxation, and they are not bearing as much as either the bankers' organ, the Economist, nowadays desires or as the professor of political economy at Cambridge suggests. Meanwhile, we deliberately increase, without necessity, the rise in the cost of living, which is oppressing every poor household. It is important that we should be reminded of these things, because they are not being overlooked by the organized wage earners, whilst they are either slurred over or completely unexpressed in most of the newspapers read by the propertied class. The widespread resentment at the conscription of labor remaining still unaccompanied by the conscription of wealth—a perfectly practical measure—will not conduce to the removal of "that hostility between capital and labor" on which Mr. Bonar Law bases so much of his hopes for the future.

These are not, Mr. President, the words of anybody whose loyalty to the Government of Great Britain can be questioned. This message comes to us with the authority of one who has given the most profound consideration to the subject of meeting the demands in a way to make Great Britain succeed in this great ordeal through which she is passing.

It is really astonishing that the wealthy class in this country should remain so blind to the way in which they have now been thrown over by the economists as well as by the workmen. Far from bearing more than their proper share of the national burden, as they fondly imagine, these 30,000 or so families (with incomes of £20,000) are bearing much less than their share—

And under an income tax the rates of which applied to the incomes of this country would produce hundreds of millions of revenue in excess of that which will be secured under the rates proposed here—rates proposed in any amendment offered—and a war-profits tax more than two and a half or three times the amount proposed by the committee to be levied as excess war-profits taxes—less than the orthodox political economy of to-day can approve, and less than they will be allowed to bear when this country comes to be effectively controlled by a democracy sufficiently enlightened to insist on its finances being regulated on scientific principles.

It will be noted that the foregoing is the language used by a paper of commanding influence and at a time when a war-profit tax of 80 per cent is being levied on the industries of that country, except the shipping industry upon which the war-profit tax is 88 per cent.

The London Economist, an exceedingly conservative paper, and referred to above as the bankers' organ, on June 23, 1917, had this to say:

Financing the war by inflation, as we have repeatedly shown, increases the cost of the war, makes the Government borrow in depreciated currency sums that it will some day repay in money, which, we may hope, will have returned to a more normal level of buying power, throws the cost of the war on those least able to bear it by putting what amounts to an indirect tax of something like 100 per cent on many articles of common use, so produces a bad spirit in the country which is full of suspicions of profiteering, turns the exchanges against us, and so faces us with a serious problem on the day when the submarine no longer protects our gold store by raising the cost of shipping gold. The system is so foolish and so unjust that it could only be described as criminal if it were deliberate.

This is the language used in criticism of the English system of taxation as it exists at this time. Can you imagine what language would be used to describe a system of taxation on war profits and incomes such as is proposed in the bill we are now considering?

That the wealthy classes of England have as yet found no occasion to change their luxurious mode of living appears from the following from the Economist of March 3, 1917:

After the war it is all important that industry shall be as little as possible let and hindered by taxation. During the war industry's task is in many ways simpler; and, above all, taxation is now wanted to check the extravagance of unpatriotic and thoughtless people whom no other appeal will reach. A paragraph in last Sunday's Observer, which has aroused considerable comment, pointed out that "quite a crop of dances occurred during the week, the most important of which was given by the new Lady Curzon. It was beautifully done and extremely smart and in all respects well up to prewar-time conditions." This entertainment is surely entitled to live in history along with the Asquith wedding in 1915, which was so awkward a stumbling block in the way of preachers of economy for many months afterwards. The Times has been investigating the extent of social dissipation now prevalent and stated in a leading article on Wednesday last that "there are whole circles of society, both in London and elsewhere, in which the spirit of sacrifice is utterly unknown and prewar-time conditions still flourish without the smallest regard for the exhortations of the prime minister and the food controller." On the same day the Manchester Guardian had an article on the effect of the restriction of imports on women, the burden of which was that women need not be much afraid that the pleasure of dressing themselves prettily need seriously be interfered with.

From the Economist of March 31, 1917, I quote the following:

We can greatly lighten our after-war burden by paying by taxation a much larger part of the war cost than we have hitherto financed by this means. Money that the government can get at home by borrowing it can get by taxing, if it taxes aright.

I commend that statement to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lorge], who has so many times upon the floor in the course of the consideration of this question asked, if we increased the taxes very greatly in this bill, where would the money be found to finance the loans? Mr. President, every dollar that is taken by taxation is worth more than a dollar invested in Government loans, I remember that Secretary Chase in 1863, in urging that more should be raised by taxation, said something like this—I will not pretend to quote him exactly—that one dollar raised by taxation was worth two dollars in enhanced credit to the Government on loans that it might seek to make.

I repeat the sentence:

Money that the Government can get at home by borrowing it can get by taxation if it taxes aright. Thereby it cheapens the war by reducing inflation and lightens the after-war burden on industry, a point of which it is difficult to exaggerate the importance. * * * Our view that taxation is the right financial weapon in war time is indorsed by an eminent neutral opinion, expressed in an article by Prof. O. M. W. Sprague in the March Economic Journal, entitled "Conscription of income," and based on a paper read before the American Economic Association.

Prof. Sprague is one of that great body of some 310 of the leading economists of America connected with the leading universities and colleges of the country, who, very early in the consideration of this financial question as connected with the present war, filed with the Ways and Means Committee of the House a petition urging, as I read and understand it, that the war should be wholly financed by taxation. That is, the argument in that petition was based upon the pay-as-you-go policy.

I continue this quotation:

After dwelling on the many inequities and economic drawbacks involved by the borrowing policy, the professor suggests, "tentatively and mainly for illustrative purposes," the following plan as the ideal to be aimed at by a belligerent State:

"All or at least 95 per cent of all income in excess of the average annual income received during the two years preceding a war should go to the State. This proposal simply involves an extension of the excess-profits tax which has been adopted very generally during the present war. In addition, ordinary income should be taxed to the bone, but not beyond the point which would still leave every class of taxpayers sufficient income to maintain the essentials of its customary standard of life. Let us assume as a starting point a special war tax of 5 per cent on incomes of £300, or perhaps £240, and of 10 per cent on incomes of £400, incomes between these limits being taxed at the higher rate. By successive stages the rates would be increased until 50 per cent of incomes of £8,000, and, let us say, all incomes in excess of £20,000 were taken by the State during the period of the war."

Although this is a quotation from Prof. Sprague, evidently the Economist has translated the American money terms into English money.

That is the end of the quotation from Prof. Sprague's article in this editorial of the Economist. I now quote the concluding sentence of the editorial:

A form of financial conscription that leaves anyone with £20,000 a year at such a crisis can not be said to err on the side of severity.

The New Statesman of June 2, 1917, making a comparison between the prewar profits of some corporations and their present profits, says:

The rise in Liptons * * * is * * * explained by the appearance of the report. This is another company which, like most concerns dealing in food, has been placed on its feet by the war. The net profit works out at £258,500, as compared with £160,300 in the last prewar year. A dividend of 7½ per cent is paid as against nothing for the last two years, and 6 per cent for the five preceding years.

For astonishing war profits, however, we must turn to the report for 1916 of the Oceanic Steam Navigation Co. (Ltd.), the well-known White Star Line. Against an issued share capital of £3,750,000 in shares of £1,000 each (of which four-fifths were issued in August last, fully paid, as a bonus on the existing shares—i. e., four new shares given in respect of each old share held), the company shows a profit of £2,402,758 after providing for excess-profits taxation. In 1913 the profit was £1,121,268 without, of course, first having to allow for any excess-profits duty, so that after making full allowance for this additional tax the war has resulted in this great company more than doubling its profits.

I quote from the Economist, London, of January 6, 1917, the following explanation, accompanied by tables, showing the profits and the remarkably prosperous condition of the leading business concerns of England, and which also shows an increase of from 3 to 13 per cent over the average earnings of a number of years, including the prewar period.

Mr. President, I have made these liberal quotations from these authorities because the one argument which I think must and ought to be weighed by the Senate and the most important argument advanced against the amendments to increase the war-profits tax is that we must not cripple business so that production will be interfered with or so that we shall have nothing to tax hereafter. I think everybody will agree that it is of the utmost importance that the business of the country shall continue to be prosperous and that all the opportunity shall be afforded for the expansion required to meet the exigencies of the times. But always, when I think of that, I am reminded of the fact that these concerns have had three years of exceedingly high profits that have gone untaxed; and then, when one makes a study of the profits of all the leading corporations and business concerns of the country in the prewar period—and by that I mean the three years preceding the war—he can not fail to be impressed by the fact that those were exceedingly prosperous years for the business of this country. We are not touching capital. This war-profits tax takes nothing out of the normal profits. It is only levied upon the war profits, and leaves untouched all of the profits made prior to the war.

I quote here from the Economist of January 6, 1917:

For many years it has been our practice to present a quarterly review of profits earned by public companies, the statistics being compiled from figures published during the quarter in the Economist. Before proceeding to an examination of the result, we may explain, for the benefit of those of our readers who are not familiar with these articles, that there is published in the Economist a table called "Summary of company profit and loss accounts," which appears every week toward the end of the paper. As its name implies, this table summarizes the results disclosed in all company reports appearing during the week (mines, railways, and insurance companies excepted), grouping them under several different headings. By combining these figures and eliminating companies whose previous results are not available, statistics are obtained which enable the following comparisons to be made.

During the past quarter the reports of 196 companies have been analyzed, showing net profits, after payment of debenture interest, of £15,767,539, as compared with £12,951,376 disclosed by the same companies a year ago. Our first table shows the figures for each quarter of the past year.

Mr. President, of course I will not tax the patience of the Senate by reading into the Record the tables, but will ask to have them printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Net profits (after payment of debenture interest, etc.).

Reports published in quarter ended—	Number of companies.	1915	1916	Increase.	Per cent.
March 31.....	286	£20,047,736	£23,536,746	£3,489,010	17.4

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There are a few words in explanation or interpretation of the figures of the first table, which I will quote:

Thus 932 companies whose reports appeared in 1916 earned a net profit of £86,587,823, showing an increase of £19,357,781, or 23.6 per cent, as compared with the previous year.

The average profit per company in 1916 works out at £93,000, a remarkable increase on £72,100, the average shown a year ago, and £76,000 two years ago, and a fact which augurs well for a big revenue from the excess-profits duty.

An analysis of the figures for the past quarter, according to the various groups, gives the following results.

I ask to incorporate at that point, without reading, the table that follows.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (reading)—

The last quarter of the year shows a striking change with regard to the proportions distributed, more going to ordinary shareholders and less being set aside to reserve. This seems to show that less uncertainty now exists as to the demands which the excess-profits duty is likely to make and that the amount is now set aside before arriving at the net profits instead of being held in suspense. It should be pointed out that the last column both in the above and in the following table includes the addition to the balance carried forward. The great diversity of method adopted by directors in presenting their accounts with regard to reserve and depreciation allowances makes close comparison difficult, but the figures have been treated as uniformly as is possible. Similar figures for the past quarter in each of the individual groups are as follows.

I ask to incorporate that table with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (reading)—

Breweries and iron and steel companies have adopted a fairly conservative policy, but the land companies, which have had a bad year, have distributed 68 per cent of their profits to ordinary shareholders and reserved less than 12 per cent. The motor and cycle companies have been more careful, while nitrate companies have taken advantage of returning prosperity to safeguard the position. Shipping companies only show reserve allowances of 20 per cent, but in their case large sums are usually written off for depreciation before striking the profit figure. The rubber companies have reserved a larger proportion than usual, but the tramway concerns have drawn on their funds to the extent of nearly 50 per cent of their profits to pay their dividends. The figures of the British Columbia Electric Railway, which withdrew £70,000 from the reserve fund, are responsible for this result.

The next table shows the proportion borne by net profits to total ordinary and preference capital for each quarter of the year, together with the similar figures shown a year ago.

I ask leave to insert the table following:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

1916	Total capital.	Profits.	Percentage.	Percentage a year ago.
First quarter.....	£231,298,827	£23,536,746	10.2	8.9
Second quarter.....	193,272,763	33,924,702	17.6	11.6

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (reading)—

There is thus an increase in the average return on capital of 3 per cent to over 13 per cent, which is slightly above the average of the last three or four years.

The rate of debenture interest naturally shows but little variation, but the preference rate is slightly higher for the year. An average distribution of 11 per cent on ordinary capital is quite satisfactory in these days of heavy taxation, and there is a welcome increase in the proportion set aside to reserve.

Mr. President, these statements as to the condition of business in Great Britain, where it carries the taxes before stated, it seems to me should quiet the fears and apprehensions of Senators as to any risks to the business interests of this country following the adoption of the amendment which I have offered. This ought to dispose of any claim that our industries will be injured by the application of a war-profits tax of 80 per cent.

It will be borne in mind also that our business concerns, or many of them, have already had the advantage of two years of war profits before we entered the war which have escaped taxation altogether.

I am aware that I have trespassed upon the time of the Senate at great length in giving the experience of England in levying and collecting the war-profits tax, but the experience of England is the best and practically the only available source of information so far as the experience of any other nation can aid us. Nor do we need to look elsewhere, for the experience of England leaves no doubt as to the course we should pursue. The fact is that England started with a war-profits tax at double the rate that is proposed in this bill, and has rapidly increased it since. Her statesmen, economists, and her people all unite in declaring that she made a serious mistake in taking war profits too low at the beginning and in not raising the tax quickly enough to remedy the initial error. Without previous experience of her own, and without the experience of any other country to guide her, the legislators of England may be pardoned for their blunder, but for us to repeat the blunder, aye, for us to start the war-profits tax at only one-half of the English rate at the beginning, with all the information that we have and with the benefit of England's experience, would not be merely a blunder—it would be nothing less than an economic crime.

There came in my mail two or three days ago clippings from a New York paper, which I believe were from the New York Times, though the name of the paper does not appear. They set forth London interviews, one from Lord Chief Justice Reading, whom you will recall paid us a visit a couple of years ago as the representative of Great Britain at the time of the first Anglo-French loan. This interview was under date of August 25, 1917. That is less than a week ago. I only quote a part of the interview; it is quite at length and very interesting.

Now, this interview is addressed to us here in America. It is really addressed to us in contemplation of the legislation that is before us, for the fact is referred to in this interview, and we had been considering this financial bill for some three weeks at the time Baron Reading gave out this interview, in which he said:

Don't leave the burden of the war to posterity. * * * Governmental figures show that revenues of the current year [for England] are estimated on a basis of $2,000,000,000 from incomes and excess-profits taxes.

The time has arrived when little measures will not suffice. Sweeping action is necessary. It is not a question of raising five million here and ten million there; it is a question of raising billions.

The interviewer then asked the chief justice, in view of the debate now progressing in the American Senate over taxation, to outline for the American people how England is meeting the problem. In reply the chief justice is quoted as saying:

Sound finance requires that we pay for the war as far as possible out of war-time taxation. Britain, recognizing this, is now unprecedentedly conscripting wealth, and very soon she must greatly increase taxes on incomes.

England has proved the wisdom of this method I have outlined; she is able to face an extension of that principle as far as necessary and possible.

The history of the United States, like that of England, has shown the fallacy of attempting to leave the burden of the war for posterity to pay.

Germany, on the other hand, practically disregarded a fair and democratic method, is raising only an infinitesimal portion of her war expenses from incomes and war profits. In the future Germany will suffer the consequences of this policy.

Unfortunately, it is true France and Russia are also pursuing it, but there is reason to believe the United States plans to adopt the wiser and safer course.

Yesterday just before the introduction of the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] had read from the Secretary's desk a statement that France had just proposed, or is about to levy, a war-profits tax of 80 per cent. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in order to diminish the importance of that fact in the consideration of the Senate, offered as a sort of an explanation and as an offset to that high tax that France only levied a light tax upon incomes. But according to the views of Lord Chief Justice Reading the taxation policy pursued by France throughout this war period is not a policy that should be followed by the people of this country. France has made the mistake of copying largely the policy of not only Germany but of Russia, and as a result for generations to come will be in a most embarrassing condition.

The other clipping received by me in the mail which I have mentioned refers to a valuable discussion of a recent editorial appearing in the London Statist, one of the leading journals of England, whose editor, Sir George Paish, is perhaps the leading financial writer of England. The article severely criticizes the Government for not taxing more and borrowing less. I quote from the Statist, as reported in this newspaper clipping:

Experience of office of chancellor of the exchequer has already brought Mr. Bonar Law to recognize that we have deplorably muddled our finances and that if we do not mend our ways we shall have an exceedingly difficult time before us when the war ends. That is to say, when borrowing has to be stopped and the problem of repayment has somehow or other to be solved. He is the first finance minister that has openly and adequately given warning to the public. Whether his two predecessors during the war were under the impression doing only what was right or whether the accumulation of experience has forced everybody to see what the well-informed recognized at the beginning, it has come to be fully appreciated, apparently at the treasury, that we have badly mismanaged our arrangements.

After referring to the attempt to imitate the German war machine, after hostilities started, the Statist continues:

And because Germany could call up its whole manhood, it was taken to be so true that one might as well contradict the Gospels, that safety was to be found only in man power.

Therefore, the system which enabled Marlborough to gain his great victories and which after nearly a quarter of a century of struggle ended successfully the revolutionary wars of Waterloo was discarded as something that might very well have done in antediluvian times, but which was quite inadequate in the era in which German kultur was instructing the world.

Senators may remember, as I pointed out a few days ago in discussing the income-tax features of this bill, in the wars referred to which ended with the battle of Waterloo, England paid 47 per cent of all costs of the war by taxation, and did not have war profits and excess incomes to draw upon.

The Statist proceeds:

Accordingly, we withdrew our manhood from productive employment and we actually set up to fight as a great military power and, at the same time, to finance all our allies who could not finance themselves.

How pregnant the meaning for us are these words of the great English financier. We have not only set out to fight for ourselves the most expensive war the world ever dreamed of, in the most expensive way conceivable, and not satisfied with attempting to finance the bankrupt allies of Great Britain, we are now undertaking to finance Great Britain herself, and to do it upon the most unsound and unscientific principle of borrowing, instead of taxing. Of this stupidity on the part of Great Britain the Statist says:

Is it possible to conceive a union of stupidity, of arrogance, and of ignorance more astounding than such a policy? And yet we are at the end of three years of war, and for the first time a chancellor of the exchequer warns Parliament, not in the honest, express language that would have been befitting, but in language that is clear enough for all that, that we have blundered in that, as in everything else, and that if we do not take exceedingly good care we shall find ourselves soon in an awkward position. When some of us tried two and a half or three years ago to open the eyes of our rulers to the folly they were committing we were treated as if we were little better than false to the country.

And so it has become the policy in this country, and I regret to say that that policy has to some extent been practiced in this body, of condemning as disloyal and unpatriotic any man who has dared stand for the principles of sound finance and just taxation as a means of meeting the expenses of this war and who has ventured to oppose the shifty and evasive methods being applied to this greatest of all problems of war finance.

There is one other point of view from which we may examine this question, and that involves the condition of our industries and their ability to pay without injury or even inconvenience the highest war-profits tax that has been suggested. In this connection I present a table showing for 95 of the leading industrial corporations of the country the bonded debt, the preferred and common stock outstanding, the preferred dividends and common dividends, and the per cent earned on the common stock for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1916.

A comparison between the net income for the year 1916 with the prewar period gives some idea of the tremendous amount of war profits earned by these corporations. The war profits of some of these companies, together with a percentage of such war profits above normal profits, are: The American Agricultural Chemical Co., $2,969,918, over 100 per cent; American Beet Sugar Co., $4,880,027, over 250 per cent; American Hide & Leather Co., $1,309,082, over 250 per cent; American Steel Foundries Co., $2,900,618, nearly 600 per cent; American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., $9,110,584, about 4,500 per cent; Anaconda Copper Co., $47,151,795, over 400 per cent; Armour & Co., $15,363,358, over 350 per cent; Barrett Co. (American Coal Products Co.), $3,025,942, over 200 per cent; Bethlehem Steel Corporation, $40,518,860, over 1,300 per cent; Central Leather Co., $12,016,398, over 350 per cent; E. I. du Pont de Nemours Co. (du Pont Powder Co.), $76,581,729, over 1,400 per cent; Standard Oil Co. of New York, $20,425,510, over 100 per cent; United States Steel Corporation, $207,945,933, over 300 per cent. Figures such as these require no comment.

This is a very extensive table, Mr. President, and I ask to have it incorporated as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In this connection also I present a table showing for a number of the leading railroads the bonded debt, preferred and common stock outstanding, the net income, the preferred dividends, and the amount available for dividends on the common stock for the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1916.

Mr. President, I ask that that table also be printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I also present at this time a table showing the surplus carried to profit and loss account of a number of the leading railroads and of industrial corporations for the years 1895, 1900, 1905, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, and 1916.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That table shows the steady growth, the annual growth, of the amount carried to surplus and is very interesting. I believe it will be of value in connection with another portion of the bill not now under consideration.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator whether in those figures the amount of the net earnings which were appropriated for betterments and extensions appear as surplus, or whether the surplus is the amount remaining after the appropriation of net income to these new investments for betterments?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The table shows the amount not of the total accumulated surplus but the amount carried as surplus after paying dividends, interest, all fixed charges, and I think after also paying for betterments, permanent improvements, and extensions.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. To illustrate the question which I desire to propound for the purpose of getting information, I desire to say that I recall one corporation which had last year a net income of about $19,000,000. It appropriated out of that amount $7,000,000 for investment in new physical properties and appropriated other amounts for sinking-fund requirements and other similar purposes, and only carried to the technical surplus account what was left after making that appropriation of net income. What I wished to know was whether or not the Senator was able to ascertain in the cases covered in the table if such deductions had been included?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The table, I think, has been constructed in that way. I so directed. It shows simply the amount of surplus after making these deductions.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have not been able to get any figures which are arrived at on any other basis.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is very difficult to get the other figures at all.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am exceedingly interested in what the Senator is saying.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to ask the Senator, if it will not disturb any obligation he owes to anyone, as to the source whence he gets the report of the profits and returns of these institutions? Do they make them public?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The table as I shall print it will state at the head exactly the source from which the figures are derived. They are derived from Moody's Analyses, Moody's Manual, and from like recognized and accepted authorities.

Mr. LEWIS. I will tell the Senator what is in my mind: It is whether these estimates are speculations, calculations of these commercial agencies, furnished according to the best information they have, or whether they are reliable as reports from the concerns themselves.

I have observed, I will say to the Senator, that in income-tax matters whenever we have attempted to levy an income tax—not in all cases, but in most instances—upon the published reports, invariably we have had these concerns come in and deny their accuracy. Then the Senator from Wisconsin had an experience which may probably refresh his mind. He stood on this floor presenting to the Senate a reliable and authenticated report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, prepared in the exercise of its duty, as to returns on certain railroads; and yet when those same railroads came to ask for increased rates they absolutely denied that those reports had any verity or were true at all, stating that they exaggerated their returns; and they disputed them as having any verity.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The tables will give the authority from which they are derived. Some of them depend upon the reports, as to railroads, made to the Interstate Commerce Commission; and they have been compared with the returns made by these corporations to such publications as those to which I have already referred; that is, Moody's Analyses and Poor's Manual.

Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate after this lengthy discussion, already no doubt unnecessarily exhaustive, with a recapitulation of the figures shown in these several tables. I will take the time to say, however, that they show that the last year was the most prosperous since 1900, at least for the leading railroads and industrial corporations of the country, and I believe was the most prosperous year for them in the entire history of the country. From these tables you will see the immense war profits already made and placed beyond the power of taxation by these corporations.

If they are never allowed to make another dollar out of this war, they have already made fortunes out of it that should satisfy the wildest dreams of avarice and greed.

The railroads of the country made last year $200,000,000 net above all expenses, more than during any preceding year in the history of the country.

Two-thirds of all the traffic in the United States was handled last year by railroads earning more than 7½ per cent on all their capital stock outstanding in the hands of the public, and by stock I mean not only the stock legitimately issued but the watered stock as well.

Two-thirds of the traffic in the eastern district was handled by railroads making an average of over 15 per cent on their outstanding capital stock.

Two-thirds of the traffic in the western district was handled by railroads that made an average of over 12 per cent on all their capital stock.

Two-thirds of the traffic in the southern district is handled by railroads that last year made an average of more than 13 per cent on all their capital stock.

Twenty-seven railroad systems handled two-thirds of the traffic in the United States.

They have an accumulated unappropriated surplus of over one thousand million dollars.

In these tables I have presented you will find the immense sums carried as surplus from year to year by both railroad and industrial corporations.

But why pursue the subject further? The facts are incontrovertible; there is and can be no dispute concerning them. The figures I present are taken from official sources and their accuracy can not be questioned. Never, sir, in all the history of the world were the great corporations and business concerns of this country in as good position to pay a high war-profits tax as they are to-day. Never was the demand for any tax more thoroughly just or more thoroughly grounded in experience.

We claim to have profited by the military experience of other nations in this war. We conscripted men almost as soon as the war was declared, and in doing so overturned our traditions as a nation and, as I believe, violated our Constitution. We immediately invested the Executive upon his demand with the most searching and arbitrary power over the lives and property and welfare of the people of this country that has ever been exercised by potentate or ruler in any country since civilized government was established among men. We have done all this, sir, whether wisely or unwisely is not now the question; but we have done it because of the plea that the necessities of war demanded it.

It is only when we come to the proposition that some of the surplus wealth of the country shall be wrested from those who control it, though they do not need it, nor sometimes wisely use it, that a halt is called. Here it is, sir, that according to the plan of the majority of the Finance Committee the necessities of the war are not to override all other considerations. Here it is that experience is to be disregarded, that the just demands of the people to be relieved a little from the burdens of this war are to be ignored, and a financial policy adopted which can only bring disaster to our forces in the field and discontent to our people at home. All this, sir, is to be done because wealth is not loyal enough to assume the burden it ought to bear, and up to the present time at least has been potent enough to prevent the passage of a law to make it bear something like a fair share of the expenses of this war.

I submit, sir, that from every point of view, and for every consideration, this bill should be amended so as to carry the highest rate of war-profits taxation that has been proposed.

APPENDIX 1.

The tables appended are arranged so as to show the per cent earned on common stock by the representative industrial and railroad corporations listed. Figures are given for the prewar period 1911-1913, by years, and also the average per cent earned during this period. To afford a basis of comparison between these figures and later returns the per cent of earnings on common stock for the year 1916 is also shown. The large general increase in the per cent earned is best shown in this manner.

The column headed "Preferred dividends" is the actual amount paid in the case of noncumulative preferred stock, or, where the preferred stock is cumulative, the dividend is assumed to have been paid at the usual rate unless a higher rate is quoted. This preferred dividend is deducted from the total net income for the year and the balance is considered available for common dividends. The relation between this latter amount and the common stock outstanding is the per cent given in these tables.

Where it has not been possible to obtain the per cent earned on common for every one of the prewar years during which the corporation was engaged in business, the average has not been worked out. The average per cent based on less than all three figures would not be a fair representation.

The bonded debt, where such exists, generally includes the bonded debt of controlled and other affiliated companies. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and the United States Rubber Co. are exceptions to this rule. In these cases returns for capital stock, net income, and bonded debt are given exclusive of subsidiary companies.

The general practice of the railroads, until recently, has been to maintain a surplus from year to year of practically the same amount in proportion to capital. Dividends have been paid with more regularity than in the case of industrials, and capital stock increased more gradually.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the committee amendment as perfected by the report made from the committee on the 29th of August, in which they proposed a modification of the provisions taxing war profits, but I am very weary myself, and I am sure I have wearied the Senate. I will say, however, that I requested at the time the committee's latest amendment was brought in that the Treasury expert furnish me a statement of the amount of war-profits taxes which would have been collected under the war-profits tax provision as reported originally by the committee and also side by side with that the war-profits tax which would be collected under the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I thought the Senator asked for the names of the corporations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I said I would furnish the names of the corporations which I wished to have a report upon as a sort of example or illustration of what this proposed amendment would accomplish.

Mr. President, I have waited up to the present time and that report has not been placed in my hands, except that last evening I did get a partial statement in rough pencil form. I asked for the figures to be worked out in regard to some 20 corporations so selected as to give a fair showing of how the proposal contained in the bill as originally reported was going to tax these corporations and how they would be affected as to war-profits taxes by this proposed amendment. As I have said, last evening I received a statement in the rough, not entirely completed as I understood, as to four great corporations. I expected to have laid that before the Senate this afternoon, and I had hoped that by the time I reached this point in my address there would be placed in my hands the completed report, if ready; but from what I was able to work out of as much of it as was presented to me I am constrained to say that I believe the Senate will seriously regret it if it adopts the amendment which was reported by the committee changing the plan as to the war-profits tax.

I am not prepared to go into that matter at this time. It is now approaching 5 o'clock, and if the Senate should take a recess until Monday I should be glad at that time, in connection with my argument upon this amendment, to present that matter. I feel warranted in saying that I am convinced that it would be worthy the consideration of the Senate. I believe that that amendment as worked out with respect to the United States Steel Corporation greatly decreases the war-profits tax that it will pay; and I believe that it greatly reduces the war-profits tax that will be paid by other great corporations who have made enormous amounts of money out of what is termed "war profits."

However, I do not wish to assert with certainty just what that amendment will do, when those figures are not entirely completed; but I can assuredly have them by Monday morning, and I am going to ask whoever is in charge of the bill for the committee—and I see present the ranking member of the committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]—if we can not now take a recess until Monday morning. It is Saturday afternoon, and very late.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. HOLLIS. I submit an amendment to the pending bill and ask to have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS entered the Chamber.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to ask the Senator if he will not consent to take a recess now and let me go on for a brief time on Monday morning. I do not think I will be more than half an hour or so; but I have been delayed because Mr. McCoy has not been able to furnish me up to the present time with the tables I requested and which, as the Senator will recall, he was to give me. I think that is a reasonable request to make; it is Saturday afternoon, and already late.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from Wisconsin whether the figures as to the individual corporations which he already had prepared show that less money will be raised by the amendment which the committee has recently reported than by the bill as originally reported from the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I want to say, as I said before, that the figures that I received from the expert last evening as to four of these companies were in pencil, in the rough, and were not complete. They require further computation to be made, and for that reason I do not wish to make that statement with certainty; but I do feel morally certain in my own mind that it works out in that way, and I believe it is a matter of very great importance and one that the Senate might well wish to have laid before it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might go on until 6 o'clock this afternoon, but of course I recognize the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a member of the committee, that he is tired—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not ask the Senate to take a recess on that account; but I have not been furnished with the statement I requested. I am not complaining about it, because I know it requires a good deal of labor upon the part of Mr. McCoy, the expert of the committee. He thought he could give me the figures complete last night, but he was not able to do so; and when I came to the floor they had not been received.

I had hoped that they might be brought to me here while I was speaking; but I do believe these computations to be exceedingly important and, from what I saw of them last night, very worthy of the serious consideration of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. How long does the Senator think it will probably take him Monday?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should think not much more than half an hour.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move the Senate take a recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m., Saturday, September 1, 1917) the Senate took a recess until Monday, September 3, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 1, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

With unbounded faith and confidence in Thee, our Father in Heaven, author of all the purer and finer instincts of our being, help us to follow their lead in every duty that pertains to life, that its issues may be the devout consummation which all true men long for, pray for, that brotherly love may obtain in all the peoples of all the world, and Thy kingdom indeed come, and Thy will be done in earth as in heaven, through Jesus Christ our Lord; for it is written:

"Fear thou not, for I am with Thee: be not dismayed; for I am Thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, August 30, 1917, was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. HILL was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

REPRESENTATIVE MANN.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will take the privilege of making an announcement that he is certain the House will be glad to hear, which is that the Hon. JAMES R. MANN is being rapidly restored to his usual good health. [Applause.]

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—STEELE AGAINST SCOTT.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., September 1, 1917.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Sir: I have the honor to lay before the House of Representatives the contest for a seat in the House of Representatives for the Sixty-fifth Congress of the United States for the eleventh district, State of Iowa, Thomas J. Steele against George C. Scott, notice of which has been filed in the office of the Clerk of the House, and also transmit herewith original testimony, papers, and documents relating thereto.

The Clerk has opened and printed the testimony in the above case. In compliance with the act approved March 2, 1897, entitled "An act relating to contested-election cases," such portions of the testimony in the above case as the parties in interest agreed upon or as seemed proper to the Clerk after giving the requisite notices have been printed and indexed, together with the notices of contest, and the answer thereto, and such portions of the testimony as were not printed with the original papers have been sealed up and are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections.

Two copies of the printed testimony in the aforesaid case have been mailed the contestant and the same number to the contestee. The law in reference to the briefs of both the contestant and contestee has been complied with as far as possible upon receipt by the Clerk of said briefs.

So far as the briefs have been furnished to the Clerk, they are ready to be laid before the Committee on Elections upon the order of the House, together with a tabulated statement, which has been prepared by the Clerk, showing the number of pages of testimony and the present status of said contested-election case, and all papers in connection therewith.

Yours, respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The contested-election case referred to therein is referred to the Committee on Elections No. 1.

JAPANESE MISSION.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Virginia rise?

Mr. FLOOD. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Speaker be requested to invite the Japanese mission, now in this country, to visit the House at 12.30 p. m. next Wednesday, and that, if these gentlemen honor us with that visit, the House take a recess of 30 minutes at the time they come.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print my remarks in the Record on the pink boll worm.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by inserting a part of the speech of William J. Bryan before the University Club on yesterday at Chicago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to either one of these requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record by printing an opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, dated February 17, 1912.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BOND LEGISLATION.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I present the report (No. 132) from the Committee on Ways and Means to accompany the bill H. R. 5901, known as the bond bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reports the bond bill, H. R. 5901, which is referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to know whether the hearings on the bond bill are ready for the Members of the House.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that they will be printed some time to-day. It took some time to correct them, and I understand they could not finish the work until some time this morning. We hope to have them printed to-day, so they will be ready to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. We will not be able to get them before Tuesday. Monday is a holiday.

Mr. KITCHIN. You will be able to get them late this afternoon.

Mr. MADDEN. And to-morrow will be Sunday.

Mr. KITCHIN. You can get them up here.

Mr. MADDEN. There is nobody here to give them to you.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will give the gentleman mine.

Mr. MADDEN. Monday is a holiday, and you can not get it then.

Mr. KITCHIN. You can. Just as soon as it is printed we will have a sufficient number at the Ways and Means Committee room. I believe we will get it late this afternoon, or if you send there to-morrow morning you can get it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the Ways and Means office room be open to-morrow morning?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be a good idea to have it mailed to the Members?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will try to do that. I will instruct my clerical force that it be mailed to each Member.

Mr. MADDEN. It is the most important matter we have had to consider up to this time. We ought to have the hearings.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I will have it put in each man's box in the House Office Building immediately after it is printed.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TUESDAY AT 11 O'CLOCK A. M.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. next Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLET. Does the gentleman intend to meet at 11 o'clock?

Mr. KITCHIN. We would like to finish general debate on this bond bill on Tuesday, and I think if we could meet at 11 o'clock we would be able to finish the general debate on that day.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have had a large number of requests to speak in general debate. I wish the gentleman would not move to close general debate on Tuesday, but would let it run.

Mr. KITCHIN. There will not be any disposition on my part or on the part of any other gentleman to limit debate. If the gentleman wishes to debate further we will not close it except by general agreement.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let it run until we see how much time we will need.

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can close debate on Tuesday we will do it; otherwise not.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman wish to make any announcement about the parade on Tuesday, for which an invitation was accepted by the House?

Mr. KITCHIN. We can tell better on Tuesday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made the inquiry because that may enter into the question of the allotment of time for general debate.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will arrange that Tuesday morning.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman does not intend to move that the general debate be closed as of Tuesday now?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. Every man will have sufficient opportunity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina about the parade. Are steps being taken for the House to go as a whole, or those who may choose to go? What is the program?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the Doorkeeper, Mr. Sinnott, has made some arrangement, and we will adjourn in sufficient time for the Members to join in the parade.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question: Monday being a holiday, the gentlemen who wish to speak on this bill in general debate would have only until 11 o'clock on Tuesday morning in which to prepare their remarks. Would not the gentleman think it advisable to meet at 12 o'clock Tuesday?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. I will take up the time from 11 o'clock to 12, whether anybody is here or not.

Mr. FORDNEY. What is your object in beginning at 11 o'clock?

Mr. KITCHIN. So as to get through the general debate as early as possible. It may take us two days; and we will have to adjourn about 2 o'clock on Tuesday for the parade. You can save that hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will not object to that; but some gentlemen thought we ought not to meet until 12 o'clock.

Mr. KITCHIN. That will be all right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House meet at 11 o'clock Tuesday?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House, under its order, adjourned until Tuesday, September 4, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting estimates of appropriation required by the War Department for the service of the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 355); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication of the Secretary of War submitting estimates of appropriations required by the War Department during the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 356); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. KITCHIN: A bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 5902) to provide for the registration and drafting into the military service of certain aliens resident or found in the United States, and for the deportation of a portion thereof; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. PORTER: A bill (H. R. 5903) to extend to certain aliens the provisions of an act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BRODBECK: A bill (H. R. 5904) granting an increase of pension to Levi S. Flinchbaugh; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5905) granting an increase of pension to Esasis Loukluff; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 5906) granting a pension to Martha J. Miller; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5907) granting an increase of pension to Millard I. Nettleton; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GRAY of New Jersey: A bill (H. R. 5908) granting a pension to Otto Henkel; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: A bill (H. R. 5909) granting a pension to Almeda Gillett; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MANN: A bill (H. R. 5910) for the relief of Lena R. McCauley; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MOON: A bill (H. R. 5911) granting a pension to Mary E. Martin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. RAKER: A bill (H. R. 5912) for the relief of Clara Elizabeth Huntington Hatzfeldt; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5913) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the McCloud River Club for 40 acres of land in the Sacramento land district, California; to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: A bill (H. R. 5914) granting a pension to Laura E. Cass; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5915) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Conley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARY: Petition of the Milwaukee Real Estate Association, Milwaukee, Wis., urging drastic measures to secure a more abundant transportation and supply of coal; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of the American Protective Tariff League, New York, urging that all tax laws, beginning with the tariff act of 1913, be printed consecutively in one document and carefully indexed; to the Committee on Printing.

Also, petition of the Woman's Advisory Committee of the Milwaukee County Council of Defense, urging the passage of the bill providing for allowance, indemnity, and insurance for officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of sundry citizens and corporations of Milwaukee, Wis., protesting against any increase in postal rates or special tax on publishers; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the Milwaukee Real Estate Association, Milwaukee, Wis., protesting against any discrimination against the real estate business in the pending revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Edw. G. Jones, pharmacist, West Allis, Wis., favoring the elimination of tax on patent medicines from the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the American Blacksmith Co., Buffalo, N. Y., protesting against special tax on publishers in the revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Henry Hell Chemical Co., of St. Louis, Mo., protesting against the retroactive feature of the war-revenue bill; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of George Zacher, Peru, Ill., for conservation of public lands, etc.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of the Litchfield Manufacturing Co., Waterloo, Iowa, concerning the proposed tax on excess profits; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of the J. N. Johnson Co., Mount Vernon, Ill., favoring the passage of House bill 5410; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of citizens of Newton County, Ind., favoring the passage of the Purple Cross bill, House bill 5410; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOON: Papers to accompany bill granting pension to Mary E. Martin, House bill 5911; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. STRONG: Resolutions of the Improved Order of Red Men, Punxsutawney, Summerville, Tidal, Brockwayville, Reynoldsville, Big Run, and Hellwood, Pa., favoring immediate action upon Senate joint resolution No. 84, authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WOOD of Indiana: Petition of citizens of White County, Ind., favoring the passage of the Purple Cross bill; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 3, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Lodge	Robinson
Bankhead	Hollis	McCumber	Saulsbury
Brady	Husting	McKellar	Shafroth
Brandeggee	James	McNary	Sheppard
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Martin	Sherman

Fletcher	Kirby	Penrose	Thompson
France	Knox	Pittman	Trammell
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Poindexter	Vardaman
Gerry	Lewis	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Gronna		Ransdell	Watson

Mr. STONE. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. REED] is still unavoidably absent from the Senate. I have heard from him that he will return in the course of a few days.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent from the Senate because of illness in his family. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on account of illness, and the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] on official business.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

I wish also to announce the absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

SELECTIVE-SERVICE PARADE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, on Tuesday at 4 o'clock, as all Senators know, a parade is to be had in this city in honor of the men about to go to the front. The Senate has been invited to participate in the parade. In order that it may have an opportunity to do so, I move that to-morrow at 3.30 p. m. the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock the following morning, Wednesday.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the hour of the parade?

Mr. MARTIN. The parade commences at the Peace Monument at 4 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday. I have moved that the Senate take a recess at 3.30 p. m. to-morrow until 11 o'clock a. m. on Wednesday.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, there may be grounds for legitimate and serious disputation as to the real facts and causes which led the United States to enter into this unfortunate world war.

We may differ as to the wisdom or prudence of our country, at this or any other time, forming entangling alliances with the Governments of Europe or the Governments of any foreign country; but there can be no difference of opinion regarding the duty of every patriotic American citizen, in public or private life, in the matter of paying the tribute of honor, love, and respect to the brave boys in khaki, whether they be volunteers or drafted men, who are to give their lives, if need be, in defense of the Nation's flag in a foreign land.

Such a tribute should come from the hearts of all Americans with that spontaneity with which the perfume is breathed from the "glowing breast" of the fragrant rose, or the pellucid stream gushes from the side of the rugged mountain. It should in truth be as free and ample as the circumambient atmosphere which sustains the citizen's life.

In accepting this invitation to participate in this ceremony complimentary to those splendid young men we do not honor the soldier as much as we honor ourselves. Their cup of glory, God bless them, is full to overflowing. It is quite equal to the infinite sacrifice which they are called upon to make.

But by this simple tribute which we are permitted to pay to them we especially honor ourselves and serve posterity. We inculcate a lesson, establish a precedent, we erect a monument, as it were, in the minds of our children and their children's children which will stand, resisting the corroding hand of time, pointing to the higher and better way—an example that will be respected, followed, and emulated as long as heroism is a virtue and the love of home, fidelity to country, and reverence to God shall animate the human breast. The time that the Senate will consume from its arduous duties in taking part in this parade will be most profitably spent.

I trust, Mr. President, that the motion made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] may be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia, that the Senate take a recess at 3.30 p. m. to-morrow until 11 o'clock the next morning.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

PETITIONS.

• Mr. WADSWORTH. I present a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of New York, urging action by the Federal Government giving preferential treatment to the manufacturers of farming implements. I ask that the resolution be printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Whereas the increased production of foodstuffs is vital and essential to the successful conduct of the war; and
Whereas the prompt manufacture and timely distribution of farming implements is of utmost importance in facilitating and increasing production: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the President of the United States, food administrator, Council of National Defense, the Federal Trade Commission, or other Federal authority having jurisdiction, be, and they are hereby, respectfully requested to make and promulgate such rules or take such measures as will—

First. Give preference to the manufacture and distribution of iron, steel, and other materials required for the manufacture of farming implements.

Second. Require the transportation companies to place farm implements and materials used in their construction in a preferred class so as to insure rapid transportation and speedy delivery.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, Council of National Defense, Federal Trade Commission, and to the United States Senate and House of Representatives and to the several Members of such bodies representing this State therein.

Resolved, That the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be, and they are earnestly, requested to use their utmost efforts to accomplish the objects of this resolution.

By order of the senate:

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly August 24, 1917, concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly:

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I also present a resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of New York, urging action by the Federal Government for the mobilization of farm laborers, which I ask to have printed in the Record.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

Whereas the war has made it necessary to stimulate the production of foodstuffs in order to successfully feed our people and the nations now allied with us; and

Whereas the greatest necessity is felt for the increased supply of farm labor to help properly increase the output of foodstuffs; and

Whereas many of our immigrants and aliens have had valuable experience as tillers of the soil in their native countries; and

Whereas many of those declared exempt from the draft have had similar experience at home: Now therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the President of the United States, the Secretary of War, the Commissioner of Immigration, the Food Administrator, the Council of National Defense, the Federal Trade Commission, or other Federal authorities having jurisdiction, and they are hereby respectfully requested to make and promulgate such laws or take such measures as will—

First. Determine who among our immigrants and aliens and exempt conscripts are capable of performing farm labor.

Second. Mobilize such immigrants, aliens, and citizens or exempt conscripts and send them to the States and Territories where their services are required.

Third. That the proper provision be made for the salaries of such farm laborers.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President of the United States, Council of National Defense, Federal Trade Commission, the Commissioner of Immigration, and to the United States Senate and House of Representatives and to the several members of such bodies representing this State therein.

Resolved, That the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from this State be and they are earnestly requested to use their utmost efforts to accomplish the objects of this resolution.

By order of the senate:

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

In assembly, August 24, 1917, concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly:

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry organizations, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the drafting of aliens, except alien enemies, into the military service of the United States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, just before the Senate took a recess Saturday evening I referred to some figures which I had requested the Treasury expert, who has been advising the committee, to furnish showing the effect on the amount of war-profits tax which would be paid by a few corporations, I think 20 in number, selected at random hastily by me, under the bill as reported by the committee, and also under the new amendment reported from the committee. As I said, the corporations had been selected hastily and entirely without reference to any effect that might result from the computations made. I have now received the figures from the Treasury expert, but I have not had an opportunity to confer with him concerning them.

I have taken as correct a table presented by the chairman of the Finance Committee in his speech in support of the Senate committee bill, which table is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5969. I was led to make reference to that table because on examining the figures handed to me by the expert I noticed a very marked discrepancy between the estimate of the expert as to the amount of taxes which the United States Steel Co. would pay under the bill as first reported, as compared with the amount of war-profits tax which that same corporation would pay under the table commended by the chairman of the Finance Committee and used by him in his speech printed in the RECORD August 15, and also exactly the same discrepancy between the figures of the expert as to the amount of money which would be collected as war-profits tax from the United States Steel Co. under the bill as reported by the committee as compared with the figures printed in the minority report showing the amount of money which that corporation would pay under the bill as reported.

The figures presented by the chairman of the committee in his speech of August 11 and printed in the RECORD are found in the table on page 5969 of the RECORD of that date and give the amount of money which the United States Steel Co. would pay as a war-profits tax at $76,726,471. If Senators are interested in this matter and will turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 5969, and to the table printed on that page, and to the first item in that table, they will then have under their eyes the corporation to which I am calling attention and the amount of tax as a war-profits tax it will pay according to the table, which the chairman of the committee commended as a safe one for Senators to follow as to the amount of war-profits tax which the Senate committee bill would collect.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think if the Senator will examine my observation preliminary to presenting that table he will find I made the statement that the data was furnished by a certain great financial institution in the city of New York, with the request that the Treasury experts would look into it and, taking the data as correct, would fill in the amount that each of these companies would have to pay under the Senate committee bill and under the House bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me a minute, the data upon which the Treasury experts made their estimate were the figures furnished by this great financial institution of New York.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; I have that before me and intended to read the exact language of the Senator to the Senate, because it becomes pretty important for the Senators to determine before they adopt the committee amendment, which presumably is to greatly increase the tax upon war profits, to be assured that they are making no mistake.

I pause to quote exactly what the Senator said at that time. On page 5968, at the bottom of the second column, the Senator said in his speech delivered and printed on August 11, and very carefully revised to correct errors before it was printed, and I think I may say that as to the figures it passed under the eye of the very expert who has furnished me these figures—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. On page 5968.

The table—

Says the chairman of the committee—to which I call attention is one that does not come from an expert of the department—

That is true—

The data upon which it is based come from a source supposed to have knowledge of the affairs of the corporations with which it deals. The rates given in the table have been worked out or tested by official experts and they can be relied on.

Mr. President, the amount of taxes which corporations would be expected to pay under the original Senate bill is shown in the last column of the table on page 5969, to which the Senator from North Carolina referred and assured Senators that the rates in the table had been worked out or tested by official experts and could be relied upon. According to those rates, the amount of taxes which the United States Steel Corporation would pay under the bill as reported from the committee the last time was $76,726,441.

Mr. President, as a minority member of the committee I have engaged a bureau which devotes itself to work of this kind and takes employment from the railroads, from individuals, from officials, from whomsoever desires to engage it, in working out data on correct bases for the use of those who employ that bureau. It has its offices in the Southern Building and employs some 30 or 40 accountants and experts to do this work. I think it is regularly employed by railroads and by shippers whenever they have matters to present to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think there can be no discount or dispute as to the high character of this bureau, from the extensive business which it does, and from the men who are at the head of it. Mr. Lauck, who heads the bureau, was formerly connected with the Federal Government in some statistical or economic work. That bureau worked out the tables which are found as a part of the minority report which has been submitted to the Senate, and the figures worked out by that bureau are identical to a dollar with the figures printed in the table presented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and supported by him when he used that table with the assurance that the rates in the table had been worked out or tested by official experts and could be relied upon.

The rates in the minority report as to what the United States Steel Co. would pay under the bill as reported are given at $76,726,000, in round numbers, the same as in the table used and referred to, as I have stated, by the chairman in making his speech, although in the minority report the computation has been made by a different set of experts. The fact that they agree to, I think, within one dollar as to what the United States Steel Co. would have to pay under the bill as reported is pretty good evidence of the correctness of the computation by whomsoever made.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do; certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, in the table I presented I took the statement of net earnings of the Steel Corporation made by the financial institution which furnished the table, and made my calculations based upon that. The Senator from Wisconsin in his minority report did the same thing, and reached exactly the same result as to the amount that they would pay. Now, the Senator claims that there is a discrepancy between the amount that they would pay as stated there and the amount that the expert who has been making some figures for him shows they would pay now under the present bill. I wish to state to the Senator that the difference grows out of the fact that there is a provision in the bill which was not taken into account in making that calculation, which relates to the increase of capital. The Senator will remember that provision as to the increase or the decrease of capital.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do remember it, and what have you to say about it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have this to say about it: That the expert in making this statement has allowed for the increase in the capital.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that he makes a mistake about that. There has been no increase of capital in the United States Steel Co. during those years.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me to finish my statement—on the amount—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will. I beg the Senator's pardon. I thought he had finished.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know whether there was an increase or not. I have not investigated it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I have.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the expert advises me that there was an increase, and that, allowing for that increase, they would be entitled to a larger deduction than was given in making the estimate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The expert is mistaken. There was not any increase.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the expert advises me that the increase was in the surplus.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Ah!

Mr. SIMMONS. He advises me there was an increase in the surplus; and if a surplus is put into the business, under this bill that would be an increase of capital for the purpose of making the calculation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; so it would. Under the bill as originally reported by the committee surplus was not to be taken as a part of the capital; but under the amendment which has been reported by the committee, distinctly and in terms, surplus is made a part of the capital, to the advantage of a great many corporations; to the advantage of all of them, in fact.

Mr. President, the United States Steel Co. did not change its capitalization in 1911, 1912, and 1913; even up to 1916, as you will find if you investigate the facts; the capital of the United States Steel Co., preferred stock and common stock, remained the same. I printed in the tables prepared by the bureau to which I have referred in the address which I made to the Senate on Saturday exactly the amount of the common stock and the preferred stock, which make up the capitalization under the bill as reported from the committee. Under the rules accepted everywhere that makes up capitalization. That did not vary during those years; and yet, Mr. President, it is disclosed by what the chairman of the Committee on Finance says that that is exactly what the expert did; that under this new provision sprung on the Senate, allowing surplus or by its terms compelling surplus, wrung out of the people by these great corporations having the power—the monopoly power, because they control a majority of production—to take what they please in prices, these great surpluses now are to be made a part of the capital by the terms of the amendment defining capital which was presented by the committee on the 29th day of August.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Pardon me; but the bill as reported from the committee contains no provision authorizing surpluses to be counted as a part of the capital. It did contain a provision which required, if there were changes made in the capital of the corporations in the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 or 1916, that the changes be taken into account in determining the amount of war-profits tax which the corporations should be compelled to pay; but it did not contain the provision which you will find in the amendment defining capital, which makes the surplus under the amendment as presented a part of the capital of the corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield in just a moment. That, Mr. President, entirely changes the basis of the computation, and entirely changes the result as to what a corporation will have to pay under the war-profits tax.

Mr. President, what I am trying to impress upon Senators is this: That in order to ascertain the amount that would be paid by a corporation as a war-profits tax under the bill as reported you are to take into account nothing excepting that which in the bill is specified as necessary to compute the amount that would be paid by a corporation under those circumstances; that is, you are to deduct from the war profits which the corporation makes during the taxable year—and we have all of us taken what the corporation makes in 1916 as a guide—you are to take from what the corporation makes in the taxable year as a net profit the average of what it made during the three prewar years designated in the bill, and the amount that is left constitutes the war profits upon which to compute, upon the graduated system in the bill, what the total amount of war-profits tax will be to be paid by the corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield to the Senator very soon, if he will allow me to conclude this thought, if he pleases.

If the capital was changed—and I am speaking now of the bill as reported—during the prewar period or in 1916, you have to take account of that in making your computation. Under the amendment reported there is a definition of capital prescribed which was not previously in the bill. Why? Because they propose to allow an exemption of from 6 to 10 per cent to corporations, and the moment that you attempt to figure out an exemption based upon a percentage of profits or earnings you have got to determine what the capital is as a base figure upon which to operate with your percentage, whatever it may be. Therefore it became necessary in the amendment reported by the majority to fix upon some definition of capital. I stated on Saturday—and very few of the Senators now present were then here—that the committee had striven for 8, 9, or 10 weeks to avoid doing that thing, because they realized that no living man outside of the corporations themselves knows what is the invested capital of any corporation. The corporations know; but no one else knows. There is a wide difference in every case between the invested capital of a corporation and the book value of the corporation, taking into account all of the stock that has been issued, whether it has been paid for in money, paid for in fictitious valuation upon good will, in fictitious valuation upon trade-marks, in fictitious valuation upon patents, or whether it has been issued, as has been the case in hundreds and thousands of corporations in this country, just as a naked gratuity. The great body of the railroads of this country were built out of money raised on bonds, and the stock issued was pure water. That is known to every student of that problem.

Now, Mr. President, the committee, seeking to do justice in this matter, endeavoring to report a bill here that would be productive of results that could be relied upon, said, "We must leave out this question of capitalization; that is one of the weaknesses of the House bill; it is a fundamental weakness; it is a weakness that we can not afford to permit to get into this bill, because the moment we say we will take a certain per cent of the profits, whether it be the gross profits or the net profits of the company's business, that moment we have to accept what the company says is its invested capital; there is no other way." It is true that when the committee reported this amendment, on that very day I questioned the Senator from North Carolina about it, and he said, "Well, in order to avoid the difficulty which confronted the House we have incorporated a provision here under which the Secretary of the Treasury may in any case where he is not satisfied with the amount reported as invested capital make an investigation, and then it is provided what he may do"; but, Mr. President, any man who has studied the question of ascertaining the value of the corporate property in any line of business knows perfectly well that it is an investigation upon which the Secretary of the Treasury can not enter within the year within which this tax must be collected. To put that responsibility on him was tantamount to saying, "We will accept whatever the corporations say their capitalization is as shown by their book value." Why, we have had thousands of men at work under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain the value of the railroad property of the country as a correct basis, or one of the elements of a correct basis, for rate making. They have been engaged upon that work for five years, and have only ascertained in a tentative way the value of two railroads.

They have made progress in the investigation of the value of other railroads, but it is a great undertaking, a tremendous undertaking. We went through it in the State of Wisconsin, and I know by experience something of it in that State. The railroads came in and submitted all of the facts they had according to their books, and that shortened up the work considerably; they submitted their maps, their profiles, and everything connected with the business, and that aided materially in advancing the work of the valuation of the railroads; but that was only for one State, Mr. President. It is a tremendous undertaking. When you say that as a solution of this problem of ascertaining the invested capital of corporations you have left it to the Secretary of the Treasury, so that whenever he believes that they report too much capitalization, a capitalization that is fictitious and that would save them from paying some of their taxes, he can have recourse to an investigation to determine the matter, that is simply speaking the word of promise to the ear only to break it to the hope.

Mr. President, it is not possible for the Secretary of the Treasury to do any such thing as to determine the invested capital of these corporations. The merest novice knows that. I do not mean to reflect upon the good intentions of anybody; but I say that when that provision as put in here as a solution of the method adopted by the House, and which was denounced in the report of the committee as being unworkable, which was denounced in the speech of the Senator from North Carolina, the chairman of the Finance Committee, as being an unworkable proposition to ascertain the true invested capital upon which to figure any per cent—I say, Mr. President, when that is presented here as a solution for the method presented in the House bill—to say that thereby any sort of relief has been offered, any sort of escape from all the difficulties which the House plan presented, is to offer husks, Dead Sea fruit, to the Senate.

Why, Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury has a very limited force for carrying out the income-tax law and the corporation-tax law. So small a force has he that the statistical department of that bureau is recognized by all statisticians throughout the country as being but a makeshift. It has not been the fault of the Secretary. It is not the fault of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He has begged of Congress additions to his force which would give him an efficient bureau of statistics, which would enable him to administer this law and to have collected in taxes on incomes and in fines many times more than such a bureau would have cost. All that has been laid before the appropriations committees of Congress and has been denied. Nobody can say why, excepting, if you speak charitably about it, that the committees were actuated by a spirit of false economy.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I fear the Senator has forgotten that I desired to interrupt him.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I have not forgotten. I am coming back to that subject presently. I am making a bit of digression, if the Senator will pardon me; but I do want to get impressed upon the Senate before I return to this table, with reference to the amendment that has been offered here by the committee which it is estimated will produce a large amount of additional revenue, that if there is anything in the figuring of the expert, going through all of the corporations of the country in order to produce the total amount of revenue which can be derived under the proposed amendment, that is, like it is in the single instance of the United States Steel Corporation, then, Mr. President, the figures of $498,000,000 additional revenue to be expected under this proposed amendment will prove, I fear, very misleading to the Senate and to the country.

I say, Mr. President, that everything that the chairman in his report said in denunciation of the plan of the House applies equally well to the method which he now proposes to apply as a basis for taxing war profits in the amendment which is proposed from the committee. He must resort to the same system of taking, as the invested capital, that which is reported by the corporations, which he criticized in the House plan; and his recourse to an investigation by the Secretary of the Treasury to determine when a given corporation is misstating its invested capital is the application of a rule that will be found impossible of being implied at all.

Mr. President, it may be remembered that there is in another portion of the bill a provision that the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine whether the money which is accumulated in the surplus of a corporation is more than is reasonably necessary for the business of the corporation, and then it is said that the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine that matter. Nobody could present to the Senate more clearly than did the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], in speaking on his amendment dealing with that part of the bill, the impossibility of the Secretary of the Treasury working out that problem. He would have to have as intricate and as expert a knowledge of every class of business in this country as the corporations themselves have in order to limit the amount of money which they would have in surplus to that which they reasonably might be required to have there; and if he were to undertake the investigation of the invested capital of corporations he would have upon his hands a problem tenfold more complicated than that with regard to the surplus, if possible.

So, Mr. President, I say, coming back to the particular matter that I was discussing—that is, the figures presented with regard to the United States Steel Corporation—there was no change in its capital stock, there was no change in any item of business conducted by that corporation which by the terms of the bill as reported to the Senate anybody had a right to take into account in figuring the amount of war-profits tax which it would pay. As to that corporation, at least, absolutely nothing can be suggested which would alter the figures presented by the chairman of the committee in his table at seventy-six million and some hundreds of thousands of dollars, and referred to by him a little bit later in his speech in the following language, which appears on page 6632 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

As shown in the above table, the profits of the United States Steel Corporation in 1911 were over $55,000,000; in 1912, over $54,000,000; in 1913, over $81,000,000; in 1916, about $272,000,000. The tax of this corporation under the Senate bill would be $76,726,471; under the House bill, $21,885,000.

Mr. President, every figure in that speech, between the time it was delivered and the time it was published in the RECORD, passed under the eye of Mr. McCoy; and yet Mr. McCoy, the expert from whom I received these figures, instead of reporting the amount which would be realized under the Senate bill as presented to the Senate before this amendment was introduced as $76,726,471, states that it would be $59,904,009.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Do I follow the Senator in saying that that is what he states under the original bill presented by the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He states, in the tables which he has presented to me under the request which I made a few days ago, that the amount that would be paid under the bill as reported would be $59,904,009.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is, the $59,000,000 represents the same sum, under the same computation, that the $76,000,000 originally was reported to us to represent?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly; because, Mr. President, as I contend, taking into account every provision in the bill as reported which should be taken into account in ascertaining the war profits that any corporation would pay, it would figure out for the United States Steel Corporation $76,726,471; but when, after this amendment is introduced, I on the floor call for a statement with reference to the United States Steel Corporation as to what it would pay under the bill as reported and what it would pay under the amendment last reported, I get from the expert the statement that it would pay, under the bill as reported, $59,904,009 instead of $76,726,471, and I get a statement that it would pay under the amendment reported $59,904,009—exactly the same amount that it would pay under the bill as reported. That is, the figures of the expert show that the amendment proposed by the committee does not change by one dollar the amount that the United States Steel Corporation would pay.

Mr. President, taking the amount that the United States Steel Corporation would pay, as stated in the table presented by the chairman of the committee when he made his opening address, as $76,726,471, and as ascertained by the bureau to which I have referred exactly the same figures, and comparing that with what it would pay under this amendment, I find that it would save to the corporation $16,822,362.

Mr. BRADY. For the Steel Corporation?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. For the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not for me to say, Mr. President, whether or not the figures in the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina when he opened the debate on this bill are correct. It is not for me to say whether the second reference to those figures as presented in his speech delivered in this body on the 11th day of August, and very carefully revised and finally printed on the 15th of August, giving exactly the same figures, is correct or incorrect; but it stands there, and it is for the Senate to take it into consideration.

You are face to face with a very important provision of the bill—What are you going to tax war profits? Are you going to tax war profits justly? Are you going to take out of these enormous gains, coined from the blood of the youth of this country by great corporations engaged in business, a sufficient amount of their war profits to relieve the people of the country from a tax upon freight rates, upon passenger rates, and various other forms of consumption taxes, such as $82,000,000 of additional taxes on sugar, tea, and coffee? Are you going to raise a sufficient amount of total taxes from war profits and surplus incomes to properly balance bond issues? Why, sir, in these dire times we take the young boys, we take the heads of families, we take all that the people have, but you are unwilling to take the war profits of these great corporations. It is not proposed to take their enormous profits made in peace times, you leave their capital untouched, and if my amendment is adopted you would take out of their war profits only some 70 per cent, leaving them 30 per cent of blood profits to be added to the normal profits which they were getting before the war began.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the Senator's pardon; I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not going, by way of interruption of the Senator's speech, of course, to undertake to answer his argument. That would not be proper.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I could hardly be expected to yield for that. The Senator will have the opportunity to follow me.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not interrupt the Senator for that purpose, Mr. President, but simply for the purpose of correcting a statement of fact which lies at the bottom of his whole argument.

The Senator has alleged, and his speech is based upon that statement, that by reason of this definition of tax the changes which followed the definition made it necessary that we have now permitted a deduction which takes into consideration the surplus and the unearned profits, while the Senator claims that under the original bill we did not allow any deduction on account of surplus and on account of unearned profits, but that we only allowed a deduction on capital.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is mistaken in this as to his statement. Now it is proposed to add the surplus to the capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; that is the charge the Senator has made, that it is proposed to add the surplus to the capital, but in the original bill we did not add for the purpose of ascertaining the deduction surplus to capital. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I will read from the bill and show him conclusively that there never has been a time from the time the first report of the committee was made up to the present when there was not a provision in the bill that permitted the surplus and the unearned profits to constitute a part of the capital for the purpose of deduction. In that respect there is not a particle of change in the bill. Of course, it is now admitted that that is permitted. The Senator has lost sight of the fact that in our original proposition, in which we permitted an exemption to the extent of the earnings before the war, we added a provision that provided for a difference in the case of an increase or a decrease of capital since the prewar period.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true as to the increase or decrease of capital.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, here is the language.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true. I have it in mind.

Mr. SIMMONS. Here is the language. Here is the original bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has never been changed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what I contend.

Mr. SIMMONS. As originally reported.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what I contend.

Mr. SIMMONS (reading)—

If the average capital employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period.

Then a provision making allowance.

It is the capital employed in the business, but has nothing to do with capital stock. It does not make any difference what is the character of the capital, if it is capital employed in the business; and yet the Senator stands here and attempts to hoodwink the Senate by making them believe that—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. That surplus and undivided profits were not used in that business, but the capital employed in the business during the prewar period.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, when I address the Chair and have the floor I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I will not yield to any man who will impugn my motives.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You did. You stated that I stand here and attempt to hoodwink the Senate. Mr. President, I say to the Senator that there was in the United States Steel Co. no change in its capitalization, and that when he employed the table which he employed, computed upon the bill as it was then drawn and as it was reported out of the committee by experts, he says connected with the business—

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I decline to yield to you, sir.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator declines to yield when he is making a misstatement—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I decline to yield to any man who stood on this floor imputing to me a desire to hoodwink the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. King in the chair). The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I repeat what I said, whether the Senator was doing it or not he was attempting to do it and doing the best he could.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is out of order and must resume his seat. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, there is no protection for a man here against one who will violate the rules unless he will descend to the same level. I will not characterize it because that will be descending to his level. I say if he shall use abusive terms, one who is engaged in the business should be denied, as I think he ought to be, from the use of the floor. If we are going to keep the basis of discussion upon the floor of this great legislative body on a level of decency, then Senators who engage in it ought to employ terms that are at least decently courteous. As I understand it our rules require that, and it is a distinct violation of our rules to impute any improper motive to any Senator upon this floor. I have been careful in anything that I have said to acquit the majority members of the committee from any desire to mislead or hoodwink or befool the Senate, and, Mr. President, I claim for myself no more than I accord to others upon this floor.

Now, sir, let me say that whoever figured out the table that the chairman of the Committee on Finance so highly commended to this body on the 11th day of August was evidently a pretty good business man. The Senator does not disclose who it was. He used the table here and commended it highly, but he does not say in his speech by whom that work was done. Let us see just what it was:

The table to which I call attention is one that does not come from an expert of the department. The data upon which it is based comes from a source supposed to have knowledge of the affairs of the corporations with which it deals. The rates given in the table have been worked out or tested by official experts, and they can be relied on.

Mark you, Mr. President, they had that bill before them just as it was reported to the Senate, just as I had, just as the bureau that I employed had the bill before it, and they worked it out and figured out that the United States Steel Co. would pay out $76,000,000 and over. The bureau I employed worked it out at $76,000,000 and over. We had the provision that the Senator just read here. He has not shed any new light upon this point. Everybody knew that those provisions were in the bill. The business men who worked out that table knew those provisions were in the bill and they took account of them just as the expert bureau I employed took account of them. They were weighed duly, and when taken into account they gave the amount the United States Steel Co. would pay under the bill as reported at seventy-six million and some hundred thousand dollars, and the figures in this table agree exactly with the figures of the bureau that I employed.

Then comes this amendment proposed by the committee, and the Senate is led to believe that by making this change and going back to the system employed by the House, which was condemned by the Senator from North Carolina and the committee, that it will get more money out of these corporations; that it will get $428,000,000 more money out of them; and that just by adding another bracket, raising the war-profits tax on the last amount 60 per cent, you will get $70,000,000 more, making in all $498,000,000. That is what you were led to believe the proposed changes in the bill as reported would make.

The Senator would have you believe that the bill as reported allowed surplus to be included as capital. If that be so, why did the business men omit it in the computation they made of what the United States Steel Co. would pay? Why did the bureau which I employed omit it in the computation of what the United States Steel Co. would pay under the bill as reported? If surplus was to be included just as now, why should not the figures have been $59,000,000, as now found by the Treasury expert by including surplus, instead of $76,000,000 that the United States Steel Corporation would have to pay under the bill as reported?

Mr. President, it is not the same. It is changed, and the fact that it is changed is going to change the amount which is collected from corporations on war profits. Now, if when the expert was called upon to state how much 20 corporations would pay under the bill as reported and how much they would pay under the proposed amendment, it would have been very poor recommendation for the amendment if it had turned out from the computation that these corporations would pay very much less under the amendment reported than they would have paid under the bill as originally proposed. So, Mr. President, his figures do not show that fact; but in order to make a showing of a greater amount collected under the amendment proposed than under the bill as reported, as to these identical corporations he finds a very different sum that would have been paid under the bill as reported, in every instance, than the amount in the table presented by the chairman and highly commended by him in his speech to the Senate, and in the amount which those employed by me to figure out this thing also found, for the amounts which they found are in substantial agreement.

Of course they vary somewhat, because these corporations make reports at different times in the year, and you may find a slight variation in all the computations involving a large number of figures, a dollar or so or something like that, sometimes probably more than that; but there is substantial agreement in the table as worked out in the minority report and in the table as worked out in the majority report—I mean as presented by the Senator from North Carolina. Out of the 48 cases which he presented 32 of them are in substantial agreement. There is a variation as to the remaining number.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before the Senator goes into those figures generally, I should like to understand exactly the result with reference to the Steel Corporation, because that would help me understand the whole proposition. I was somewhat confused by the answer given to the question of the Senator from California. It was different from the impression I had gotten before he asked that question. Under the table submitted by the chairman of the committee the war profits of the United States Steel Corporation in 1916 were something over $270,000,000, and in that table it is stated that under the terms of the Senate committee bill as reported and pending when the statement was submitted there would be taken out of that $207,000,000 a little over $76,000,000. I understand that, according to the expert whom the Senator employed, that would be the amount taken out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly. I think there was only $1 difference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Substantially that amount would be taken out as the tax under the bill. I understood the Senator to say a moment ago that, according to the expert Mr. McCoy, under the bill as originally reported and as pending when this statement was made, there would only be a little over $59,000,000 taken.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true; $59,904,000 under the bill as reported.

Mr. JONES of Washington. And he also stated that under the bill as amended finally by the committee and the amendment which is now pending there would also be taken just the same amount, $59,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly the same. I think I will show it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Under the circumstances, in the bill as reported and pending when this table was submitted the highest bracket called for 50 per cent, I understand.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It has been stated here that we will take more from the Steel Corporation. I do not know whether it has been stated publicly, but it has been stated in the cloakrooms, and so on, that we have raised it to 60 per cent; we are not going to let the Steel Co. escape; that the Senate committee raised the rate to 60 per cent so as to get that company. Yet, as I understand it now, under that bracket of 60 per cent, according to the expert, Mr. McCoy, they will only pay a little over $59,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly the same amount as when the highest bracket was 50 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I wanted to bring out.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator pardon a question? Seventeen million dollars less is taken under the amendment and under the last bracket of the bill than you took under the original bill from the Steel Corporation according to the figures that have been given us.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is absolutely true, I will say to the Senator from California, according to the figures that were given in the table presented by the chairman of the committee and repeated in his speech when he said that the amount which the United States Steel Corporation would pay under the Senate committee bill—that is, the tax of this corporation—would be $76,726,471. Under the proposed amendment the expert employed by the Senator from North Carolina, and who has been sitting by his side while I have been speaking, reports that the amount with the increased bracket of 60 per cent will only give $59,904,000 under the new proposed amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator will pardon me, I asked the question because I have had no access to any figures at all and I have the utmost desire to get the record straight. I have no experts and no figures available. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin when he obtained the figures of the expert he has just now referred to?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I obtained them Saturday night—the night before last.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I interrupt the Senator from California?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to permit the Senator from North Carolina to ask the Senator from California a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield to a question addressed to the Senator from California by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is true that taking the returns of the Steel Corporation for 1916, $271,000,000, the increase we made from 50 to 60 per cent for that year would make no difference, and for the very plain reason that in 1916 the profits of the Steel Corporation did not exceed the 50 per cent rate in the original bill. Now we have increased it to 60 per cent. It is estimated, based upon the returns of the two quarters of this year, that the Steel Co. this year will make a net profit after deductions of about $490,000,000. That will be subject to this tax instead of $271,000,000. Having raised its percentage of profit up to the 60 per cent rate, it will be caught by the 60 per cent rate this year, when it would not have been caught last year because the profit did not exceed the 50 per cent rate of the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That is, on the estimate for this year, but on the actual figures of last year, the amount that would be received, is the statement unchallenged that it would be $59,000,000 under the amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; based upon the rate of last year, upon the average earnings of the year.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I say, based upon 1916 earnings that are now definitely and definitely ascertained, would the amount of tax under the amendment of the committee be $59,000,000? Is that statement unchallenged?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think $59,000,000 or about $60,000,000 is approximately correct. I wish to state to the Senator that I have stated to the Senate that the estimates contained in that table were based upon the figures as given, as I said, by a financial house. I gave the name of that house when I was speaking; but a Senator asked me to withdraw it, and I did so in deference to his views. I took their figures; the expert took their figures. He was not making a calculation, except as he was requested to make it, which was to show how much that corporation would pay upon the date given.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I beg the Senator not to think that I am questioning the accuracy of his statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator will pardon me just one word, if the Senator from Wisconsin will allow me. If the expert had applied to those figures the bill as it was written at that time, it would have amounted to $60,000,000, just as it amounts to $60,000,000 if applied to the bill as it is written now.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. As I understand, so that it may be clear, the statement is unchallenged that under the amendment, based upon the definitive figures of 1916, the Steel Corporation will pay $59,000,000 of taxes, in round numbers, and that under the original bill presented the computation that has been stated here is erroneous and that the Steel Corporation upon the definitive sum determined in 1916 of its income would pay just the like tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. The statement is that the estimates were made, based upon the statement of this financial house, that it had net profits subject to this tax—

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am not questioning the estimates or the fact that they were made in the best of faith. I want the facts; that is all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me state to the Senator that if the provision of the bill allowing for an increase or decrease of capital, which was in the bill from the beginning and has been kept in the bill, had been applied to these figures which came from the financial house to which I have referred, it would have reduced their taxes, in round numbers, to sixty millions instead of seventy-five million dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, if you apply the rates in the bill to-day to those figures it will produce exactly $60,000,000—the same—because the returns of the amount of profits in 1916 were not caught by the increase from 50 to 60 per cent, but the profits this year, nearly double what they were that year, will be caught by the 10 per cent increase.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I desire to say that I wanted to be perfectly certain of the fact that the $76,000,000 reported to us should be $59,000,000 or $60,000,000, as the case may be—I speak in round numbers—and that that sum thus reported at $76,000,000 is an error, and the same sum as under the 60 per cent bracket, based upon the 1916 earnings, would be the tax of the Steel Corporation.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, under the 50 per cent bracket.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from California should understand any such thing. I believe that the amount of $76,000,000 that would be collected from the United States Steel Corporation, provided the bill passed as reported, is accurate as stated in the table, or is substantially so; and that if the bill passes in the form in which it is now proposed to be amended by the committee, the United States Steel Corporation will save $16,822,362.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am not questioning the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin any more than I was questioning the accuracy of the statement of the Senator from North Carolina; but I was trying to accentuate the position taken, as I understood it, by the Senator from North Carolina in respect to these figures.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator whether the same discrepancy or anything similar to it is claimed now by the majority of the committee with regard to these other 48 several corporations that are mentioned in the table which the Senator from North Carolina put into the Record?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was going to take up another one immediately following the one I have been discussing.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina, in his speech on August 11, which was printed in the Record of that date, at page 5969, the Bethlehem Steel Co., it was stated, would pay a tax on war profits of $25,045,090. I will find the exact language of the Senator from North Carolina on that subject and read it to the Senate. On page 6632 of the Record the Senator from North Carolina said:

The Bethlehem Steel Co., under the House bill, would be taxed $7,125,000; under the Senate bill, $25,045,000.

Mr. President, the expert in computing what the Bethlehem Steel Co. would pay under the bill as reported gives me instead of $25,045,000 the sum of $21,825,994, and under the bill as proposed to be amended by the committee he finds that that company would pay $19,729,060, or $5,316,030 less than the amount given in the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina under the bill as reported.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am following the Senator's speech with great interest. I think it might help some if we could get a general principle; or is the Senator going to deduce his general principle when he gets through and would rather not have it referred to now? It seems to me that a corporation is helped or hurt by the latest amendment in accordance with the amount of its capitalization. If they have a very large capitalization, of course the 10 per cent would give them a large deduction, while if they have a small capitalization the 10 per cent would give them a small deduction. Is not that the fact?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true, and it leads me to say, Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me to say—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And it leads me to say that the form of the amendment presented by the committee is a great temptation to all corporations to swell their capitalization. It invites an overcapitalization; it enables them to reduce their war-profits taxes by increasing their capitalization.

Mr. HOLLIS. Now, will the Senator permit another suggestion?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a word in that connection. I want constantly to remind Senators that the Government is powerless to ascertain what is behind the capitalization as shown by the books of a corporation, because there is no time within which to make such investigations as are necessary to determine that fact.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the Senator will permit another interruption, I desire to say to the Senator that the Senator is presenting now a certain estimate furnished by an expert. The expert, of course, has to take the capitalization or the records made public from Moody's Manual, or from somewhere else; he has to take the capitalization that the company furnishes.

Of course, if this amendment is adopted, we do not know how much of that will be found by the Government to be actual capital, actually paid in, or how much of it is water. Therefore we will be powerless under the law to state how much the deduction will be; that may only be ascertained by the Government after it has squeezed the water out. Is that correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from New Hampshire has been following me, and if he agrees with me, he would have to say that the Government is practically helpless and is compelled to take the capitalization of these corporations, or, rather, the statement of their invested capital, just as they give it. To undertake to sift out—

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. I agree with the Senator exactly as to that; I believe it is an impossible task, and that is why I am opposed to the latest amendment of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to be reasonably decent to the Senator from North Carolina after his very discourteous reference to my purposes upon this floor—

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator need not yield to me unless he wants to; I am not asking him to yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As I have the floor, it is necessary for the Senator from North Carolina to ask me if he wishes to obtain the floor to address the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator does not desire me to interrupt him, the Senator can cut off my interruption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Unless the Senator desires to have me yield to him, of course, I do not yield, as I have the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was not asking the Senator from Wisconsin to yield to me, because he said he would not yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. When the Senator has accused me of a disposition to try to hoodwink the Senate I submit to Senators in all fairness that he has forfeited his right to ask me to yield the floor to him.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have nothing to say about that, except to state—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not necessary for the Senator to interrupt me to say that he has nothing to say. He ought to have nothing to say; no Senator who imputes that sort of a motive to another Senator ought to have anything more to say on this floor in the debate in regard to that subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I only wanted the Senator to yield to me for the purpose of withdrawing that statement, and I was proceeding to do so when the Senator declined to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is out of order and the Senator from Wisconsin a moment ago was out of order. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to ask the Chair to point out to me in what respect I was out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from Wisconsin was out of order in lecturing the Senator from North Carolina—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to say—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon the Chair, in the opinion of the Chair the Senator from Wisconsin was out of order in lecturing the Senator from North Carolina, and the Senator from North Carolina was out of order in speaking without obtaining recognition. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I protest that I was not out of order in calling attention to the fact the Senator from North Carolina had violated the rules.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I could have claimed my privilege—

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, Mr. President, I rise in the interest of harmony. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the Senator from North Carolina rose for the purpose of withdrawing the offensive remarks. The question before the Senate is too serious a matter for Senators in the discussion of it to lose their heads or indulge in personalities; and I am going to suggest to my friend the Senator from Wisconsin that it would be proper to permit the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his offensive remarks, and to express the hope that no further offensive personal references may be indulged in during the discussion of this question.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have not now risen for that purpose. I am not going to withdraw the remark, because the Senator from Wisconsin would not permit me to do so when I was trying to do so, immediately after he announced that it was offensive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators hereafter must rise and address the Chair and receive recognition before proceeding to any discussion. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have endeavored in conducting my part of this debate to keep within the rules, and I think I have done so. I now desire to call the attention of Senators present to the very point suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, that a corporation that increased its capitalization secures some advantage under this proposed amendment. I think that is true.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] suggests that I read the language of the bill as originally reported and the language of the proposed amendment. I read first section 203 of the original bill, as follows:

SEC. 203. That for the purposes of this title the amount of war profits shall be determined, except as otherwise in this title provided—

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership or of a citizen or resident of the United States by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; and—

There is also a provision at the bottom of page 15, which needs to be taken into account and which reads as follows:

If the average capital—

I omit the reference to foreign corporations—employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period, the war profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the taxable year bears to the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the prewar period.

That is the bill as originally reported, and the phraseology is somewhat obscure and complicated. It was to that, I think, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] referred in his very able address when he spoke of there being obscure passages in this bill which would perplex any Senator in reading it or any official in administering it, to determine exactly what is meant; but I think it can be worked out.

The provision of the amendment upon this subject is as follows:

SEC. 203. That for the purposes of this title the amount of war profits shall be determined, except as otherwise in this title provided—

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership, or of a citizen or resident of the United States, by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

Therefore, the invested capital will be computed on the 1st of January of each year, and any corporation has the opportunity to increase its capitalization if it would be of advantage to it to do so by the methods commonly employed by corporations in such cases.

There is another provision that is important to bring to mind in this connection, and that is the definition of capital. I invite the attention of Senators to this provision. You do not find it in the bill as reported; it is here now, as a very important part of the committee's proposed amendment, and it is here for some purpose other than was in the mind of a majority of the committee when they reported the bill originally. I quote from the committee amendment as follows:

SEC. 207. As used in section 203 and in subdivision (b) of section 204, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business.

Mr. President, in the first place it would be utterly impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury or any body of experts employed by him to determine what has been paid in in cash, excepting as the books show it. If he undertook to examine as to the invested capital all the corporations in this country upon that subject, he would not complete the work in 5 years or 10 years.

Now, sir, in the second place, that part of the definition which makes "paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business" a part of the capital, introduces an entirely new element.

You do not find any provision of that sort in the bill as originally reported. That includes all of the surplus that has been accumulated by these corporations with their monopoly power by exacting from the public unlimited amounts of money, which they could carry to surplus. The tables which I presented here show that they have accumulated enormous surpluses while prices have more than doubled in the last 17 years to the American people, although the cost of production, as everybody knows, has been immensely reduced by the improvements in methods of production, by the correlation and organization of business, by the organization of selling and of manufacturing. The cost of production has been reduced and cut down immensely by the wonderful inventions that have been made, and yet the prices of all the necessities of life have steadily advanced, giving the lie to all that is embodied in the term "civilization." Civilization means progress; it means advancement; it means better living conditions to all the people; and as we develop in our methods of production, as we make new inventions and cut down the cost of producing things, it should mean a steadily reduced cost of maintaining a family. The great mass of the people should have the benefit of at least a portion of that reduction in steadily declining prices, and would have were it not for the fact that the monopoly organizations of these great corporations have enabled them to do what? To carry out the rule laid down by Morgan when the United States Steel Corporation was organized—that is, to capitalize not according to the investment, but according to the "earning power of a corporation."

In plain terms, what does that mean? It means that if a corporation has a monopoly it can capitalize, regardless of the amount of money put into the business, to the limit which it can be made to earn; that is, it can raise the price of the thing it turns out to the limit of the capacity of the people to pay. That is what monopoly means; and, sir, in no other way can you account for the extraordinary, for the criminal, increase in the cost of living that has been going on in this country for the last 18 years. From the very beginning of the foundation of this Government down to that period the cost of things produced by the mechanical genius of man steadily declined in price. Why? Because we had competition among those producing them. That competition stimulated production, and that competition stimulated invention. Under the stress of that competition, invention cut down the cost of production, and we had a steadily falling scale of prices of everything produced in America. Then, in 1898, came the period of reorganization. An abnormally high tariff made it easy to reorganize behind the tariff wall, and business was reorganized with a view of destroying competition, controlling production, and controlling prices. And so, if you study the scale of prices in the United States from the beginning down, you find in the main a trend of downward prices of all the things produced by manufacture to the period of 1897. Then they reached the lowest point that they ever have reached in the history of the Government. Then came the period of the reorganization of business, the creation of monopolies, combinations, and trusts, and prices began to ascend. This was not because we stopped inventing. It was not because we stopped cheapening the cost of production. Never before in the history of the world have such wonderful inventions been made as in the last 18 or 20 years. We have absolutely revolutionized the cost of production. We are producing things cheaper to-day, by the improved processes of machinery, than ever before in the history of the country, barring, of course, these abnormal war conditions.

Just as soon as reorganization was complete in the different lines, these great combinations, these great organizations that covered so much of the field of production that they had the power of monopoly inherent in them, although they had the best processes, the cheapest ever known in the history of production, were able, because they commanded the market, to advance the prices and to increase their profits at will. So prices began to ascend, and at every stage of every year, from that time down to the present, prices have ascended. The reason why they have ascended is not because the cost of production increased. On the contrary, the cost of production decreased. Whatever share labor has gotten in the way of advanced wages is but a drop in the bucket as compared with the doubling of prices of the necessities of life caused by the organized power of monopoly over our markets and their production down to the beginning of this war.

Mr. President, it was under that power that they began to create these mighty surpluses which are now, by the terms of this amendment, to be created into new capital. In God's name, Senators, stop a moment and consider. What was the capital invested in business originally, before this power was given to monopoly? It was that capital which was furnished by those who organized the business. It is fair that there should be returned to that capital enough in profits to maintain the business—that is, to keep the plant in working order, to replace old machinery with new; to keep the capital unimpaired, in other words. That is fair. That is just. That is called "maintenance" in technical terms, and it should keep the plant up to its high efficiency. The public must pay for that. Otherwise, the capital invested in the business would waste away in the course of operations, and you never could induce capital to go into business on those terms. Therefore, profits should be high enough to pay for the maintenance of the property, keeping it in perfect condition, I care not whether it is a railroad, a factory, a street car company, or what form of private enterprise it may be.

The profits must also be high enough to pay all the cost of operation; that is, running the business, the wages of the men, the coal that is consumed in producing power, and all other expenses connected with operation. More than that, the public must pay enough for the products to furnish a good, round profit for the capital actually invested.

Mr. President, what right has any corporation to charge the public high enough rates or prices to build up a surplus, and what are the just limitations to such a surplus?

A corporation has the right to charge enough to provide for maintenance, operating expenses, and a fair return on the capital which it has actually invested in the business. Then, Mr. President, it came to be established as a just principle that they should put by a reasonable sum in addition, so that when the business in lean years, in unfortunate years, suffered a shrinkage, that it could pay the maintenance charges and the operating expenses and a fair return on the capital. This was the genesis of the surplus—a limited sum held in reserve—a sum sufficient in amount to draw on, so that the business could be kept at a normal level even in a bad year. That was particularly held to be, has been since the beginning, and is still held to be the rule that must be applied to those corporations which come under governmental supervision, as the public-utility corporations.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it is just for a question. I want to go on.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question to point an illustration. I should like to have his theory of the rule regarding the application of this tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will come back to that a little later, if the Senator please.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am pursuing something that is quite apart from that just now, and I do not want to be diverted until I finish it.

Mr. President, with the railroads, the rule has always been held to be that they should not be allowed to accumulate any more surplus than would reasonably provide for carrying them along in lean years, when production was light and transportation revenues depleted.

Mr. President, I should like Senators to follow me on this. I undertake to say that the Supreme Court of the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission have never yet sanctioned the accumulation of a surplus by a public-service corporation for any other purpose than to insure to them in poor years, when transportation fell off, such rates as would simply pay for maintenance, operation, and a fair return upon the capital actually invested in the business. In the Advance Rate cases in 1910 that was practically the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The railroads were contending then for what it is sought to put into this bill now—that is, the right to build up a surplus and make it a part of new capital that they were wringing out of the public by increased and excessive charges and use it the same as capital which had been supplied by the sale of stock for cash. In other words, they were contending that the public should furnish the capital on which to run their business, on which to build new lines of road; they wanted to wring from the people by excessive charges enough to pay maintenance, enough to pay operating expenses, enough to pay good, round returns on the capital invested in the business, and then on top of that enough more to pile up a great surplus such as the railroads of the country have accumulated in violation of every decision that has been made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have gone on doing it; and then they have used that accumulated surplus, furnished by the public through excessive freight charges, as if it were new capital furnished by themselves, and have issued stock against it, and have built out of that surplus permanent improvements, extensions, new lines; and then, Mr. President, they have capitalized those new lines of railroad, built out of the money taken from the people, and made the public pay a profit on the business over those lines built by the public out of excessive charges!

But, Mr. President, in 18 years we have built up in this country corporations in combination, and single corporations with complete monopoly power like the United States Steel Co., that absolutely dominate as to production and prices in the lines of business covered by their operations.

Now, sirs, since 1898 all this has happened. You can count on the fingers of one hand the combinations that existed in this country at that time. At the present time there are more than 12,000 of them. They cover practically all the fields of production, and they have a monopoly power, if unrestrained, that enables them to exact from the public profits out of which to build up a surplus limited only by the ability of the public to pay monopoly prices.

Are you going to put into this bill a legislative recognition of this great wrong? Are you going to give congressional sanction to this practice, which the Interstate Commerce Commission and the courts have denied to railroad and other corporations?

That is exactly what you will do—not only for railroads but for all other corporations—if you write into the law the committee amendment making surpluses a part of capital for the purposes of this bill. When you take into account the fact as to those corporations that have in an extreme degree this monopolistic power, you are going to reduce the amount of tax that they pay upon their war profits.

Oh, Mr. President, it seems to me that the Senate can well pause long enough to investigate this matter with the thoroughness that its great importance and its far-reaching effect in the future call upon us to do at this time.

Mr. President, if one were to follow the expert employed by the majority and apply his method of ascertaining what would be paid under the bill as it was reported as to the 20 corporations submitted to him and what would be paid under the bill as proposed to be amended he would find that as to those corporations there would be an increase in the amount they pay under the proposed amendment of $13,868,464; but, sir, if instead of that you take the computation which is made in the tables so highly commended by the Senator from North Carolina, verified by the tables in the minority report, you will get this result: You will find that the United States Steel Corporation, instead of paying under the bill as reported $59,000,000, will pay $76,000,000, and therefore under the committee amendment that there would be a loss to the Government or a gain to the United States Steel Co. If the computation made in the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina in his speech is correct and if the computation made in the table presented by me in the minority report is correct, and I am absolutely certain that it is, on the United States Steel Co. where with the aid of experts I have gone over it with very great care, there would be a loss to the Government under the proposed amendment in the case of the United States Steel Corporation of $16,822,362.

Upon the Bethlehem Steel Co. taking the same basis there would be a loss of $5,316,030.

Upon the Du Pont Powder Co. there would be, taking the same basis, a loss under the proposed amendment of $3,747,687.

Upon the Baldwin Locomotive Co. a loss of $203,148, as compared with the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina in his original speech.

The American Woolen Co., if this amendment were adopted, would, according to this comparison, make a saving of $1,889,857 in its taxes.

The Anaconda Copper Co. would pay $1,871,523 more under the last amendment, according to the computation of Mr. McCoy, than it would pay under the bill as it was originally reported by the committee, according to the table presented by the Senator from North Carolina in his address to the Senate in opening the debate.

Also the Utah Copper Co. would pay $4,642,962 more on the same basis.

The General Electric Co. would save $597,892.

The Delaware & Lackawanna Railroad Co. would pay $78,927 more upon that basis.

The New York Air Brake Co. would pay $197,029 less upon that basis.

The General Chemical Co. would pay $1,370,558 less upon that basis.

In other words, comparing the amount which the Senator from North Carolina said in his speech they would have to pay under the Senate committee's amendment as a war-profits tax, with the amount which the experts compute they would have to pay under this last amendment, there would be a net loss to the Government on these corporations of $23,551,161.

How much that would figure out if carried through all the corporations of this country it is impossible for me to say. Let me just say, however, that these corporations were selected in five minutes in my office to be submitted to Mr. McCoy, without any regard whatever as to what the result might be.

Mr. BRADY. Will the Senator state how much the Steel Corporation will gain?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Sixteen million eight hundred and twenty-two thousand three hundred and sixty-two dollars. The Government will lose on these corporations, I have estimated, $23,551,161.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to something else very material to be submitted in this connection.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. Lewis in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. Before the Senator leaves that part of his argument, I have been listening, I want to say, with a great deal of interest. I think I understand the point the Senator makes, but I should like to know from the Senator how much the total revenues would be increased under the new proposal of the committee over and above that proposed by the first report of the committee.

I just want to add this to my question, in order to advise the Senator what I am trying to get at. Under the original proposition of determining war profits my understanding is that if a corporation made 100 per cent on their investment prior to the war and still made 100 per cent since the war they would have no exemption. This 100 per cent therefore would be exempt from taxation. Contrarywise, any corporation that made no money before the war, and in fact lost money and now makes 100 per cent, would be taxed the full extent of 100 per cent. Now, does the Senator think that this exemption should be made on the one hand and not on the other?

Furthermore, does the Senator think that if the definition as originally proposed by the committee were left in the bill, so as not to permit the surplus to be added to the capital, that the things feared by the Senator would be eliminated, that the profits would be substantially increased not only in respect to the corporations enumerated by the Senator, but those which would make great profits would be entirely exempt from taxation? I do not know whether I have made myself clear or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator has asked me five or six questions in one interruption. I do not know whether I will be able to follow him right through in trying to make answer. His first question, as I remember, was how much would be raised by the proposed amendment or by the bill as originally reported? Which do I understand him to mean?

Mr. HUSTING. I will state to the Senator the reason why I asked four or five questions was that I did not want to interrupt the Senator continuously, and I thought I would put the whole proposition before him; but my question is how much will the bill, as now proposed by the committee, increase the total amount of tax over and above what was proposed by the first report of the committee?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, my colleague knows the claim of the majority of the committee with respect to that. He understands that they claim it will produce $498,000,000 more than the bill as first reported would produce, and all the argument that I have been making here, and all the citations that I have been making, is to show what would be collected from different corporations, applying all of the information that the Senate has before it, and it leads me to very seriously question whether more or less will be collected under that amendment. Of course, it is not possible for me to say just what the result would be; I have no experts at my command excepting as I have been able personally to employ them; but if there was any thorough-going computation made by the committee when it called its meeting and in one hour changed its whole plan of taxation, if there was any thorough-going computation made upon each one of these corporations to determine how much there will be collected from each, so that they were able to say that $498,000,000 more revenue would be received by the Government by this change than under the bill as first reported, then I am wholly at a loss to know why it took three days for the expert of the committee to make a report on 20 corporations here, and I know he labored very hard upon it. I am forced, therefore, to the conclusion that the estimate made as to $498,000,000 additional war taxes to be received is a very loose generalization, and that if the Senate and the other House follow the committee in adopting this amendment the Congress and the country will stand a very excellent chance of meeting with most serious disappointment as to the result which will be achieved under this proposed amendment.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand the Senator's point was that under the new proposition the tax of these large corporations would be decreased because the new amendment proposes to let them add surplus to capital. That is my understanding of the Senator's point.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is one of the points that I made.

Mr. HUSTING. Now, my question is, leaving the basis of capitalization the same as it was under the first proposition—that is to say, whether taking money actually invested and all profits and surplus to be added but at the same time taxing those who are still making over 10 per cent more than their prewar profits, and conceding a 6 per cent profit to those who made less than 6 per cent before the war—will the Senator say that under that proposition his figure as to an increase of four or five hundred million dollars might not be correct?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It would be impossible to say anything about that without making a computation upon that basis, and it would take some time to work out that computation.

Mr. HUSTING. Does not the Senator think it is unfair to leave those corporations exempt who were making an enormous percentage before the war, and does he not think that the limitation of 10 per cent is in the interest of justice and fairness?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That has been discussed by the day here. It is possible to cite cases of great hardship under any rule that may be adopted with respect to taxation. It is not to meet those exceptional cases that laws are framed. They are framed to adjust themselves to the general situation.

Mr. President, granting that many corporations that were making large profits prior to the war would escape by reason of the rule adopted by the committee after 8 or 10 weeks of deliberation, you are putting into this proposed amendment here a nest of evils, in my opinion, with respect to the capitalization of corporations that will bear upon the people of the United States with tenfold more burden than any little injustice that may be worked, or any large injustice in particular instances, if you follow the rule that was first proposed.

Mr. President, this proposed amendment, in my opinion, is a dangerous amendment. No more dangerous proposition, I believe, has been presented to the United States Senate since I have been a Member of it. It is fraught with unlimited evil to the future dealings between the great corporations of the country and the public.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get the Senator's idea on the point he has referred to. While it may to some extent be a repetition of the question of his colleague, the danger that the Senator suggests, as I understand his argument, comes from this definition of taxable capital.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is a very large element of danger, indeed a chief element of danger.

Mr. NORRIS. That is where the chief element of danger comes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what the Senator to a large extent has been devoting his argument to. There is another proposition in the committee amendment. I do not know but that probably, parliamentarily speaking, it will be a separate amendment. It was alluded to by the Senator's colleague. It is the one that changes the profits that can be deducted in the prewar period and says they shall not be less than 6 per cent nor more than 10 per cent. I wish to ask the Senator this question: Are not those two propositions entirely separate and distinct, and would not the one that I mentioned first, the capitalization feature, if remedied, and the other permitted like the committee has proposed it, both tend to increase the amount of tax that would be raised under the bill?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no doubt that these propositions are separable, but let me say to the Senator that the percentage proposition can not be incorporated in the bill without figuring upon some amount of invested capital, and the great difficulty with that is the same difficulty which the committee realized for 10 weeks it was confronted with whenever this plan was brought up for consideration. Every time it came up in the committee during that long period of time until the last meeting of the committee, and I think it was looked at from every possible angle, the committee considered seriously as to whether it would be possible to get some rule to determine what should be allowed as invested capital to a corporation, because the committee knew they could not take the book value. They knew that any recognition of book value would give value to the cats and dogs and water as invested capital. The committee called and had before them day after day the chairman of the Tariff Commission, Dr. Taussig, one of the eminent economists of the world. He labored and brought forth many different forms of an amendment as a rule or formula which would safeguard the term "invested capital," so that there could be some safe way of taking that as the base. Everybody recognized if you could ascertain definitely the invested capital and would apply this per cent of exemption such method would be in the interest of justice to all corporations. But he could not prescribe any form of amendment that would determine the amount of invested capital without including space and moonshine as invested capital. So the committee decided again and again that it must keep away from the invested capital bases and to adopt it would simply involve the Treasury Department in a sea of difficulties from which it could never make a safe landing.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to his colleague?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. I will say to the Senator that I have heard that argument made, and there is a great deal of force in it; only I can not comprehend or understand or appreciate why it is not necessary to go into the question of capital in order to determine what the profits are either before the war or after the war. The basis has got to be fixed as to what the profits are. Now, I want to say to the Senator—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Now, just wait a moment. I prefer, if the Senator is going to put several different propositions, to answer each as it is stated.

Mr. HUSTING. This was just an explanation of what I wanted to say.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Just a moment; let me answer this first question. To ascertain the war profits all you have to do is to ascertain the net income available for distribution to stockholders in the prewar period and in the taxable year, and it does not make any difference as to what is the capitalization. You do not take the percentage in that case.

Mr. HUSTING. But in order to determine what net profits are I fall to see why you do not have to take the book value in the prewar period as well as after the war period, because there enters into the net profits the question of what is capital stock, how much you are to allow for depreciation, how much for surplus, and things of that kind, and the percentage of profits to be determined has got to be taken into consideration. All these elements must be considered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think if my colleague will go over that matter at his leisure he will conclude that there is not any difficulty in ascertaining what the net profits are in any two periods of a corporation without such determination involving the question of invested capital.

Mr. HUSTING. That may be. Then I want to go further. I am only asking this question of the Senator to satisfy myself on the point, and I thought it might be of interest to the Senate. Are the so-called brackets based upon the amount of profits? I understood that they were based upon the percentage of profits as computed from the capital stock; that is, if 10 or 12 per cent is net capital stock, then it pays so much per cent tax, and if the percentage of profit is greater so much tax, and it is not necessary to determine what the amount of capital stock is in order to determine the per cent of profit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not at all. If the Senator, with his clear understanding of such matters, will go over the terms of the bill, he will see that under the system as first presented by the chairman of the committee he is not obliged to have recourse at all as to the capitalization; and if he will excuse me from yielding further, I am a bit wearied, I would commend to him a study of the speech of the chairman of the committee upon that subject, giving his reasons for not taking up this question of capitalization. The report of the majority goes pretty fully into this subject, and I think meets all the suggestions that are made by my colleague.

Mr. HUSTING. If the Senator will just pardon me once more, a flat percentage upon the amount of net profits, as the Senator says, can be readily ascertained. It certainly can not be subject to doubt. I just wish to say in conclusion that I agree with the Senator in his proposition that the surplus ought not to be added to the capital stock in computing the earnings. My purpose a while ago in asking the question was because it seemed to me that in fairness, if it is fair, the proposition of limiting the minimum to 6 per cent earnings and the maximum to 10 per cent might stand and the original proposition of the Senator as to what should be included in capital stock might stand, and thus increase the revenue without doing any injustice to anybody and let these particular concerns escape tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My colleague's suggestion is similar to that made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and my comment upon it would be the same.

Now, Mr. President, as bearing upon the amendment which I have offered to increase the war tax, I call attention to the report under date of September 1 which Senators will find upon their desks this morning. It is the report of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House showing the latest estimate of the amount of revenue we are to raise for the present fiscal year.

It furnishes some information that would be quite startling. I think, to the Senate were it not that since this bill came before this body you have been occasionally reminded of the differences between the majority and the minority of the committee as to the amount of money required for this fiscal year. The majority accepted the earlier estimates, and as to the amounts of proposed taxation always has adhered to the earlier estimates of the Treasury Department rather than frame the bill to accord with the later estimates. We now have as a final word up to the present time the report of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. From that report, Mr. President, I am going to read a few lines into the Record.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator give the date of the report?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. This report is dated September 1, 1917. It is entitled:

"Second Emergency Bond Issue." September 1, 1917.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed. Mr. KITCHIN, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report (to accompany H. R. 5901).

After a preliminary paragraph the report says:

At the present time the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918, made during the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, amount to $9,114,433,107.11—

That is the amount already appropriated; there can not be any speculation about that. The report continues:

and the appropriations now contemplated for the fiscal year 1918, in addition to those already made, are likely to amount to $9,891,150,000, making a total of $19,005,583,107.11 for the fiscal year.

Mr. STONE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. STONE. Does that report refer to appropriations?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have read it just as it is written here, Mr. President. Perhaps I did not enunciate clearly.

Mr. STONE. I was under the impression—and I desire to know if that be true—that the great part of this vast amount of nine billion and odd dollars was to be provided for by a bond issue. I am merely drawing the distinction as to whether it shall be appropriated for or be provided for in some other way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, in any event, the appropriations would have to be made. After the appropriations are made, it would then be necessary to provide the revenue, either by taxation or by bond issue. So I think the wording of the report is strictly accurate. Therefore, we have this sum total of $19,005,583,107.11 to be provided for the fiscal year. That is followed by this statement by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee:

It must be borne in mind, however, that $3,000,000,000 of the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 already made was for the purpose of extending credits to foreign governments and that $4,000,000,000 of the contemplated appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 is for the same purpose and is provided for in section 2 of this bill, thus making a contemplated extension of credits of $7,000,000,000 to foreign governments to be financed by the sale of bonds. Deducting from the total estimated appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 now made or contemplated, the $7,000,000,000 proposed extension of credits to foreign governments, $325,000,000 estimated receipts of the Post Office Department, and the $60,000,000 sinking-fund permanent annual appropriations which is never set aside, we find that the disbursements of the Government for the fiscal year 1918 to meet our ordinary and our war expenditures will be over $11,620,000,000.

That, of course, does not include as war expenses the loans to foreign governments. I read further:

The Secretary of the Treasury in his statement before your committee stated that the best estimate he was able to give of the probable necessary disbursements now authorized or contemplated, for the fiscal year 1918, exclusive of the $7,000,000,000 extension of credit to foreign governments, postal receipts and the sinking-fund requirements, was $11,782,371,000. Assuming that the disbursements will be as great as the Secretary of the Treasury estimates, we find that after deducting the estimated receipts under existing law estimated at $1,333,500,000, that the estimated ordinary and war expenditures will exceed the estimated receipts for the fiscal year 1918 by $10,448,871,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin allow the Chair to ask, for his own information, if the Senator has noted from observations of the Secretary of the Treasury which were reported as having been made to the House committee respecting the new loan, that the figures which the Senator is just now reading have been increased, and if so, what was the increase in that case? The Chair desires to inquire if the Senator from Wisconsin has had that brought to his mind?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have not read that statement, Mr. President. I am basing what I have to say upon this official statement which has been issued by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. The highest estimate of revenue which the bill under consideration will produce, if it realizes the expectations of a majority of the Finance Committee, under the proposed amendment is $2,500,000,000, or but 24 per cent of the estimated deficiency; that is, if the deficiency be placed at $10,448,871,000, without taking into account the $7,000,000,000 for loans to foreign governments. While it may satisfy the minds of some Senators in voting appropriations to finance these loans that it amounts to no more on the part of our Government than going surety for the loans, yet I think any critical study of the financial condition of the countries that have been given these credits must raise grave doubt as to whether this Government will ever receive the moneys loaned to certain of these governments. Applying the rules that are accepted generally by the highest financial authorities, Mr. President, they have long passed that line of demarcation set by all students of government finance when loans are considered safe.

Without considering these loans and making the calculation solely with reference to the expenditures which must be made for our own Government, Mr. President, this bill will raise by taxation but 24 per cent of the money which we must provide in this fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will yield in just a moment. If the amount to be furnished to these other Governments is to be included, then this bill will raise at the outside only 14 per cent of the amount of the total deficiency. The balance must be provided by bond issues or another tax bill must be brought in late in the fiscal year, after the corporations and the business of the country have adjusted themselves to this plan of taxation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, leaving out the foreign loans, you will be driven to raise 76 per cent of the amount to be expended this fiscal year by bond issues; or, taking these loans into the calculation, to raise 86 per cent of the expenditures by bond issues; or you will be compelled to pass another tax bill this year, late in the year. If the Congress adjourns, we shall not meet again until December; and such a bill, in all probability, can not come before this body until we have passed over into the new year. Those corporations that close their business with the calendar year will have set aside the amount of money to meet taxation under the provisions we are now passing. They will have made their distributions of earnings before a new bill to tax those earnings will be enacted.

It was said by the chairman of the committee in the opening of the debate that the United States Steel Co. had set apart already the amount of money they expect to pay under the bill as framed, and that because of the increase in their taxation under the provisions of the Senate bill and based upon the earnings of the first and second quarter would necessitate the making of a new allowance, because their war profits were going to be so much greater than they had calculated upon. So it is fair to say that these corporations, having adjusted themselves to the plan of taxation that is to be passed into law, we would be in a very poor position to come before the country in the second half of the fiscal year with a new tax bill. We, then, will be in a position where business men over the country will say with reason, "You are menacing us with a new tax after we have adjusted our business to your tax bill; you will cripple our production; we shall not be able to meet the expectations of the country." That is what you will be confronted with, and it will be a more powerful argument than the one which has been used in the course of the deliberations upon this bill, that a proposition to increase taxation now would be a serious handicap to business.

Mr. KING. And they will demand that we put the taxes on consumption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; that is what will happen. I will say to the junior Senator from Utah. They will say, "There is one source where you will not disturb business by looking for your increased tax"; and we will have a new set of consumption taxes brought in for consideration.

The rates upon sugar, tea, and coffee will be greatly increased; freight rates will be subjected to another scheme of taxation; and so on down the line of the consumption taxes in this bill. Many new sources of consumption taxes will be sought out and put into the law so that the Government may at that time get the needed revenue without hampering business. We can levy these taxes on war profits now without doing injustice. If we fix the tax now, business will adjust itself to that tax, and in January or February next, when a new bill is here, will vigorously and effectively protest against a new levy on profits which will have been distributed.

Oh, Mr. President, let us beware now; let us take warning now. If we want to divide the burden between the great wealth of the country and the people of the country, now is the time to make the division. We know how much we must raise; we know what we can raise by increasing war-profits taxes—not as much as Great Britain has done, not putting taxes as high as she has done, although our needs in this fiscal year would warrant putting these taxes that high, and the three years of untaxed war profits which these corporations have had places them in position to bear this high rate without working any injury to business. Now I say is the time for us to write into the law the correct principle upon which to finance this war. I beg pardon of the Senator from Washington for detaining him so long. I now yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand the figures which the Senator has read, it is shown by the House report on a bill which the report accompanies that this Government must raise for actual expenses before June 30, 1918, in addition to the amounts that will be raised by this bill and in addition to the $7,000,000,000 that we propose to loan to the allies, practically $8,000,000,000, if I caught the figures correctly. I understand that we must raise $10,500,000,000 aside from the $7,000,000,000 to be loaned to the allies, and that the amount raised by this bill will be about two billion and a half. If that is true, there will be left a balance of $8,000,000,000 to be cared for by the 30th of next June, which must be raised by a bond issue or by another tax bill, either by a profits tax or taxes on consumption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, in round numbers, the Senator is right in his statement, as I follow it.

Now, I do not want to repeat anything I have said; I have detained the Senate too long already, but in the face of this new demand that comes upon us this morning, according to this report to the House, and the small percentage of that total amount, provided for by taxation in this bill, I can not fail again to warn the Senate and the country that we are adopting a plan of financing this war that is fraught with the gravest danger to the soundness of our finances as a Government and with the gravest injustice to the great mass of the citizens of this country.

I remind you again that, leaving out of consideration the amount of money to be loaned to foreign governments, this bill provides by taxation for but 24 per cent of the total amount to be raised this year by a bond issue and by taxes.

If we take into consideration the amount of money to be loaned to these other Governments, this bill raises but 14 per cent of the total amount by taxation.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, why should we not take into account the loans to the allies?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think we should.

Mr. HOLLIS. We have got to borrow the money.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We have got to borrow the money, and we do not know whether or not it is going to be collected from them; we are taking that hazard.

Keeping these percentages in mind, remember that in the War of 1812, out of a total of $70,000,000 extraordinary expenditures, 10 per cent was financed by taxation; that the Government's liabilities increased with no corresponding increase in revenue to meet them; that the currency was inflated; that the cost of everything was advanced; and that nothing but increased taxes during the latter part of the war saved the Government's finances from a complete breakdown.

In the Mexican War 22 per cent of the total war expenditures were financed by taxation, and nothing but the short duration of the war and its small aggregate cost prevented financial disaster following as a result of the policy then pursued.

In the Civil War the average percentage of expenditures provided by taxation for the whole period of the war was 20 per cent, that our Government finances nearly collapsed, and that we did not recover from the effect of that blunder for more than a generation of time.

Yet at the beginning of this war, the proportions of which run beyond anything which the human imagination has ever contemplated, considering the amount of money advanced to other governments, we are starting out with a lower percentage of taxation by far than during the Civil War, despite the fact that the policy then pursued nearly resulted in financial ruin to this Government; that we are raising by taxation a lower percentage than in the Mexican War, which every economist and every student of Government finances says, except for the short duration and the light expenses of the war, would have resulted in financial ruin to the Government. I say, Mr. President, that under the pressure here of keeping down the tax upon corporations, keeping down the tax upon the big surplus incomes of the rich, we are being pressed across the danger line, where there is great peril—I say nothing now of the injustice to the people, but where, if this policy is pursued, there is great peril to the future finances and to the credit of this country.

I know our enormous wealth; I know our overconfidence. There is no government on the face of the earth that can long sustain the awful drain that this world-wide war makes upon governmental finances. We were wont to believe Great Britain was a rock of Gibraltar so far as finances were concerned. Yet she has been driven to abandon her old-time policy of taxing in proportion to the amount raised by loans, because she reached that limit; she has reached the limit on everything. She started out assuming that, with her great wealth and power and financial strength, with her flag everywhere in the world, and production coming to her over-seas from every quarter of the globe to swell her profits, she could not only finance her part of the war but could take care of the other governments allied with her; but early in April, Mr. President, she found herself with her resources depleted and her power to carry the burdens of the war breaking under the strain, and even she, with her towering financial strength, was forced to throw herself onto this Government for financial protection and support.

Oh, Mr. President, let us not make the mistake of being overconfident. Sound and rich as we are, war such as never was conceived before in its unlimited expenditures sweeps away with every tick of the clock millions and millions of accumulated capital.

But, Mr. President, there is another side to this question. As the lines are laid now in our financial policy they are likely to continue throughout this war. We may vary here and there, but when we get these big bond issues once sanctioned, when they go out and pass to the point where contractual obligations are incurred, there is then no recall.

Mr. President, I am pleading for justice—plain justice for the great mass of the people, even here in the United States Senate. And, sir, for justice—"All places a temple and all seasons summer."

Let the taxes fall, let them be meted out in as large a measure as is fair and just to the wealth of the country, but let them be gathered now, and let us relieve the people of this country from the payment of the consumption taxes embraced in this bill. Let it be remembered, Mr. President, before we were ever involved in this war, the war over in Europe had imposed upon the people of this country consumption taxes, increasing the cost of their living by enormous amounts. When these very manufacturing concerns that are making these immense profits were making excessive profits in 1914, 1915, and 1916 by charging the allies prices unheard of, inordinate, and unconscionable, Mr. President, do you know what that did? It forced prices up in this country.

Every manufacturer who bought from the United States Steel Corporation billets, structural shapes, or whatever they produced had to pay the enhanced profits which the war had given them the opportunity to charge Great Britain and the other allies. So long as they could sell abroad at enormous profits they made the manufacturing concerns of this country pay exorbitantly for everything they had to purchase from them. Then what happened? Then the manufacturers added to their prices, and so the increases were carried along and along and along to the consumers of the country, to the plain, humble folk of the country, Mr. President, and they paid every dollar of it. Consumption paid the enhanced price. Not only did these companies about which there seems to be such a great concern in the Senate lest they be taxed too much—not only did they make their great profits during those three years out of the allies, but the increased prices which they were able to charge them enabled them to raise the prices on all consumers in this country, and these profiteers were then taxing the people of this country besides making their profits out of the war abroad.

So our people were paying war taxes in 1914, 1915, and 1916 levied upon them by these same corporations that were getting the great profits out of the allies. So that now, in the year 1917, when it is proposed for the first time to take a part of these war profits, I say good conscience requires us to remember that the people of this country have been paying war taxes in excessive prices, the result of the very profiteering of these gentlemen for three years. In God's name, are you going to tax them again, and then halt and shrink back from taking over 31½ per cent, not of normal profits, not of the war profits made in 1914, 1915, and 1916, but of the enormous war profits that they are piling up in this year? Although Great Britain takes 80 per cent of the war profits, you voted down the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] for 73 per cent. I have offered one here at 72 per cent. Before the vote is taken upon that amendment, inasmuch as in a body that has rejected by a vote of 17 to 62 a tax of 73 per cent on war profits, one can have little hope of successful appeal to adopt an amendment 1 per cent lower, I may conclude to cut the rate to 70 per cent. Then, Mr. President, I shall offer at least two other amendments, say, one at 65 and one at 60 per cent. I do not make that statement now to foreclose anybody else from offering such amendments if they intend to do so, but if amendments at lower rates are to be offered I would ask to be permitted to have a vote upon amendments at, say, 65 per cent and 60 per cent after this amendment is disposed of before votes are taken upon lower percentages. I believe it to be our bounden duty to call the roll here upon these amendments, in the hope that the Senate will respond finally and impose a tax at least double the tax proposed by the committee.

Unless we do that, how can we ever go to the people, to our constituents who are giving all they have, and who in the end must pay every dollar of the money raised by bond issues, every dollar that does not come now as a tax on war profits and income taxes?

What will this great burden mean to the people of this country? Think of it! There are substantially 20,000,000 families in this country. There are 20,000,000 heads of families who are charged with the duty of supporting and maintaining their respective families. Every billion dollars which we must raise, whether by taxes or by bond sales or in any other way, means in round numbers, except for what you take out of war profits and incomes, $50 for every family. It means $10 for every man, woman, and child. The estimate of between nineteen and twenty billion dollars contained in this report means almost $1,000 per family is to be raised.

Mr. President, whatever amount is raised by bond issues, whatever comes through consumption taxes, whatever amount is raised from any source excepting war profits and income taxes, will be paid by the mass of the people through consumption taxes on the things that they eat, wear, and use; and it will be equivalent to something like an $800 involuntary mortgage voted upon every home in the United States.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate to vote a 70 per cent tax on war profits, and I change the amendment, as presented by me at 72 per cent, to 70 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. Before the Senator takes his seat I will ask him to follow his thought about the burden of what is borrowed through bond issues in this direction: That the proceeds of bond issues will be spent at inflated prices and the people will have to pay it back at peace prices; so they will have to pay back two or three dollars for every one they get.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, that is so, Mr. President. In rushing on with an argument such as I have been trying to make here to-day one can not do more than just touch upon the multiplied wrongs and evils that are wrapped up in this proposition to let off the wealth of this country upon a tax basis as low as this bill proposes. One can not do more than suggest—and I have done it, I know, all too imperfectly—the wrongs that are to be suffered, not only by the people of to-day but by our children, if this thing is to be permitted to be done. I do hope that other Senators—the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], and other Senators here—will lend their support to a better presentation of this case than I have been able to make.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield for a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the Senator yield for a question before yielding the floor?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wanted simply to ask a question as to the difference between his amendment and the amendment offered by the Senator from California. Is it simply in the change from 73 to 70 per cent? Is that the main difference in the effect of the amendment?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is the difference in the percentage.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I just want to put something in the Record in connection with certain questions that I have asked my colleague from Wisconsin, in order to make clear what my questions were based upon. My questions were to this effect—whether the bill as originally reported from the Senate Committee on Finance did not involve a question of capital stock, and involve also thereby the question of surplus to be deemed a part of the capital stock.

I just want to say that my understanding of this bill is that the percentages that are based upon net profits—that is, deductions, which means net profits—necessarily involve the question as to whether or not a surplus is a part of the net profits. If it is not going to be treated as a part of the capital stock, as appears to be the case now under the present amendment, the question might well come up as to whether or not this surplus is a part of the capital stock, the question whether or not it is a part of the net profits, and the question whether or not it is going to be taxed. Moreover, on page 15 there is this provision, which I think makes necessary an inquiry into the question of capital stock. I read from page 15, after subdivision (b):

If the average capital (or in the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual that proportion thereof which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income) employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period, the war profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the taxable year bears to the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the prewar period.

My understanding of this provision is that for the purposes of comparison an inquiry into the amount of capital stock is necessary, because you can not make a comparison between the capital stock in the prewar period and the capital stock in the postwar period without getting the basis of capital stock at least in one or the other of the instances. The amount of tax to be levied will depend upon this comparison and the proportion which the capital stock of the prewar period bears to the amount of capital stock of the postwar period. So that I feel that my question at least was proper, and that, as I understand the bill, the question of the capital stock is not eliminated even from the first proposal of the committee.

I want to say further that it seems to me that some of the objections of my colleague to the bill as proposed by the committee could be met by an amendment which would prohibit the surplus being considered as a part of the capital stock. If that were done, from the argument of my colleague I understand that these larger corporations would be in nowise affected to their benefit, but might, under the increased percentages, be obliged to pay even a greater amount; and we would at the same time be able to tax those corporations that had the good fortune to enjoy a very large profit before the war and that now enjoy a very large profit after the war, entirely tax exempt, and on the other hand avoid doing some little injustice, perhaps great injustice, to those that had the misfortune to make no profits whatever before the war, and that under the original bill, as I understand, would not only not have 6 per cent exempt, but would have no part of their prewar profits exempt, because there were not any; and if such a thing is conceivable, where before the war a concern was making no profits at all and now it is making 100 per cent profit, it would be taxed on the entire 100 per cent, while a concern which before the war had the good fortune to be making 100 per cent and still made 100 per cent after the war would be entirely tax exempt and would pay no revenue whatever on its entire 100 per cent profit.

I am frank to say that no matter which basic theory is going to be adopted upon which the tax shall be computed, I do not believe that the surplus, on the grounds made in the very able argument of my colleague, ought to be added to the capital stock, because it is quite clear to my mind, as was so clearly expressed by the Senator—and I entirely agree with him—that we should not permit the surplus of a corporation, which it is allowed to accumulate upon certain grounds of good financial policy, including public policy, to be entirely wiped out by adding it to the capital stock and then, on the ground of public policy as well as good financial policy, again permit it to pile up another surplus and absorb that and then to pile up another surplus. That is simply defeating the very object that is sought to be gained, the insurance of a sound financial condition, by piling up one surplus. In other words, there ought not to be cumulative surpluses.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have been somewhat in a quandary as to the effect of the two different systems which the Senator has just been discussing. I must say that it seems to me that under the second system, although the tax of 31 per cent may not be high enough, they will catch more of these excess profits than under the first system that the committee reported. Is that the understanding of the Senator?

Mr. HUSTING. My colleague, the senior Senator from Wisconsin, made the point that under the original scheme reported by the Finance Committee the question of the amount of capital stock did not enter into consideration at all. He contends, as I understand it, it was merely a matter of taking the amount of net profits as reported by the corporations themselves and computing upon a certain ascertained amount of profits as compared with the net profits now earned by the corporation, and computing the tax upon the difference between the prewar profits and the present war profits, a certain percentage over and above the deduction allowed by the statute. However, under the present scheme as reported by the Senate committee in computing the amount of income it now rests upon a percentage basis, and the scheme contemplates adding the surplus to the capital stock, so that in the case of the United States Steel Corporation and the Bethlehem Steel Co. and others that the Senator named, they would thereby increase their capital stock to such an extent that, notwithstanding the increased percentage to be levied upon the profit, they would be taxed less than they are in the first scheme.

The Senator instanced the case of the United States Steel Corporation. The chairman of the committee stated, and it is in the report of the committee, that under the first proposal the United States Steel Corporation would pay, I believe, a tax of $78,000,000, and the chairman of the committee said that under the present scheme they would pay only fifty-nine or sixty million dollars. It is claimed that the present payment reduced it from seventy-seven million to fifty-nine million, although the senior Senator from Wisconsin stated that he was unable to state positively what the total net result of the change would be, whether it would result in increased revenues or in decreased revenues, because of the uncertainty surrounding the meaning of the words "capital stock."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do I understand that the question of the capital stock enters into the computation at all, except as an exemption? Does not this amendment provide that it shall not be less than 6 per cent nor more than 10 per cent?

Mr. HUSTING. Ten per cent of what? Ten per cent of the capital stock?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Well, yes; 10 per cent of the capital stock.

Mr. HUSTING. So the Senator contends, and I see force in it—I believe it is correct and sound—that the question, then, arises as to what is the capital stock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; that is true, but it is all an exemption. It is only in cases where there have been large profits in the years preceding the war, leaving perhaps no war profits at all, that that provision is invoked. Is not that the fact?

Mr. HUSTING. Only in those instances where the amount is over 6 per cent. There it is a question of what the capital stock is, in order to determine what the exemption is. If the capital stock were $100,000,000 the exemption of 10 per cent would be $10,000,000, whereas if the capital stock were $80,000,000 the exemption would be only $8,000,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; as I understand, it shall not exceed 10 per cent.

Mr. HUSTING. The exemption shall not exceed that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The exemption. Consequently, if they were to show that there had been a larger amount than that, they would catch the surplus, it seems to me, over and above that 10 per cent. Unless that is the meaning of the bill, I do not understand it.

Mr. HUSTING. I think I understand it. I do not know whether I can clearly express it or not.

They are to have an exemption of 10 per cent. Let us assume that a corporation, under one theory of ascertaining capital stock, has $50,000,000 of capital stock. The 10 per cent exemption would be $5,000,000. If, on the other hand, by adding surplus to the other elements of capital it were increased to $100,000,000, the exemption would be twice that under the former plan, and they would not pay any excess war tax on the difference between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000, so that they would be that much to the good; that is to say, $5,000,000 would be tax exempt. That is the theory as I understand it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate for more than a few minutes.

I regret very much that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is not now in his seat, should have lost his temper this morning. I do not know to what to attribute his violence, whether it was on account of something that has recently happened in this Chamber or whether he felt that it was expedient to find a cause to quarrel with me this morning and make that the excuse for refusing to permit me to interrupt him when he might make statements I felt were not borne out by the record or not justified by the facts.

Mr. President, the Senator seeks to make a great deal out of the fact that I presented a table of statistics here, and that the amounts of money that the United States Steel Corporation and other corporations probably would pay as profits tax, as estimated in that table, have been found by a later calculation to be somewhat incorrect. I made a statement with reference to that matter which I thought would be satisfactory to every Senator and enable every Senator to see how that discrepancy might occur.

The Senator says I vouched for the table. I did not vouch for the table further than to state that it was furnished by a great financial institution in New York. I gave the name of that institution at the time I presented the table. I did not put the name in the RECORD, because a Senator to whom the table had been sent requested me not to use the name; so I referred to it as coming from a well-advised financial institution in New York. I stated that the calculations which the expert had made were based upon the data contained in that table as to prewar earnings for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, earnings for the year 1916, as well as to the amount of the capital of the concerns covered by the table. I stated that making the computations on the figures as furnished by this financial institution, assuming that the figures represented the actual facts with reference to the fundamental and necessary elements in making the calculation, the expert had estimated the amount of this tax each one of the establishments would pay under the House bill and under the Senate bill.

Mr. President, the difference, and the only difference, grows out of the fact that you must take into consideration, necessarily, under the provisions of the original bill and under the provisions of the amended bill the increase and the decrease in capital invested of the taxable year as compared with the prewar period. It would be ridiculous to base a concern's exemptions upon a million dollars of capital invested before the war, when after the war its capital invested was $2,000,000. In other words, if you find that since the prewar period the institution upon which you propose to levy a tax has doubled its capital, that its profits for the prewar period were made upon one-half of the capital invested in the taxable year, not to allow for this increase in capital would be the rankest sort of an injustice. Your committee recognized that fact, and when we framed this title of the bill one of the very first things that we decided in connection with this excess war-profits tax was that there must be a provision that allowed for an increase or a decrease in capital as between the prewar period and the taxable year; that otherwise it would be a rankly unjust scheme. So we wrote it into the bill. The expert simply applied that provision in his final calculation. It was not applied in the calculations based on the data of the New York table.

The Senator would have the Senate believe that the provision with reference to increase or decrease of capital was not in the bill when this calculation was made because no allowance was made for change in capital in computing this table. It was in the bill when this calculation was made, and it was not applied because we were making a calculation based upon the facts given to us by this financial institution; nothing was added and nothing was taken from the data contained in the table as thus furnished. In this last calculation the change in capital has been taken into account. The expert was not making a calculation based upon somebody else's tables, but was making a calculation based upon the provisions of the bill, and ascertained the facts with reference to capital during the prewar period and the taxable year from other sources, not from that table.

Mr. President, the Senator was attempting not only to lead the Senate to believe that there was no provision in the original bill for an increase of capital between the prewar period and the taxable year but that there was no provision in the original bill for surplus and unearned profits to be considered as a part of the capital employed in the business. He was attempting to make the Senate believe that the amendment which we have recently reported defining capital and which provides that surplus and undistributed profits shall be included in the capitalization introduced a new principle into the bill; that we were now permitting surplus and undistributed profits to be considered as a part of the capital while in the original bill we had not permitted this to be done, and that we were by this change swelling capital.

Mr. President, I called the Senator's attention to the language of the provision in the Senate bill as it was first reported and as it was reported the second time and as it now remains in the bill, providing that in estimating the increase or decrease of capital for the purpose of allowing the taxpayer the benefit of any enlargement between these two periods, and made it perfectly plain that the Senator was wrong. The provision is in language that no lawyer could interpret otherwise than as I interpreted it in my statement when I interrupted the Senator, language that is as clear as it can be made in English. Let me read the provision:

The average capital—

This is the provision allowing for increase and decrease of capital for the purpose of calculating the deduction—

The average capital employed in the trade or business during the taxable year—

Making no difference as to whether that capital was covered by an issuance of stock or represented by undistributed profits or surplus accumulated. This provision was to the effect that if the money was actually invested in the business, employed in the business, it should be considered as capital employed in the business in determining whether there had been an increase or decrease in capital. Under no possible construction of that language could it mean anything but exactly the same as the provision in the definition of capital about which the Senator was complaining. He said this would disturb the whole scheme and introduce an element of uncertainty and confusion. It means that capital, for the purposes of this bill, should consist of cash, or property taken in the place of cash, and of surplus and undistributed profits actually used and employed in the business.

That is an ordinary and a common definition of capital. Any definition of capital invested in business which leaves out surplus and undistributed profits would be a false and misleading definition. That is the definition which the House put in its bill when it attempted to apply the 8 per cent flat exemption rule. That is the definition which we adopted when we decided upon the maximum and minimum. That is in substance the definition that we adopted when we were making allowances for the increase and decrease in capital between the prewar and the taxable year. In different language, but in legal intent and meaning, it was identically the same in each case. But the Senator seems to think it is a device injected in this bill to allow somebody to escape taxation and cheat the Government of its revenues.

The Senate will remember how he inveighed against that definition. The Senate will remember he claimed that it would disturb the equilibrium and produce disastrous results with respect to the revenue to be realized from this bill.

Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that identically the same language is contained in the present excess-profits tax law passed by the Senate in March, 1917. The purpose of the bill was identically the same as this bill. It was a levy upon war profits as this bill is. Yet, Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin opened his lips in protest against that provision when the committee reported the bill I did not hear him. The Senator from Wisconsin is a member of the Finance Committee. That measure came into this Chamber and was duly considered. Senators will remember that we had a very long drawn out fight upon it during the short session. So long drawn out was the debate that the session was about to close by constitutional limitation, and the passage of the bill was so jeopardized that we had to throw overboard all Senate amendments to the bill at the last minute in order to save the bill. And yet during all those long weeks of discussion the Senator from Wisconsin did not open his lips upon the floor of the Senate in denunciation of this provision now pronounced by him as mischievous and vitiating in its effects upon the revenues.

Mr. HUSTING. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KNOX in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; if the Senator insists upon it.

Mr. HUSTING. Is it a fact that under the present plan proposed the surplus will be counted as capital?

Mr. SIMMONS. Surely.

Mr. HUSTING. And under the committee plan?

Mr. SIMMONS. Surplus and undivided profits actually employed in the operations of the business for the taxable year or the prewar year, the same in both cases.

Mr. HUSTING. The other question is, Can the Senator tell how much property would be tax exempt without the 10 per cent limitation or without the 6 per cent limitation?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not the figures to give the Senator, but I will say to the Senator that so far as those limitations upon the amendment are concerned, it does not require any demonstration or any elaboration, for it must be perfectly apparent to every intelligent mind that by the application of this maximum and minimum, while the minimum may possibly help the man who was making less than 6 per cent upon his capital during the prewar period, on the other hand the maximum will work against the man who was making more than 10 per cent during the prewar period.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. Just let me finish this statement. Mr. President, your committee had no doubt from the very beginning that it was necessary to take reasonable care of the man who was making less than a normal profit before the war. In the case of the man whose earnings before the war were subnormal we felt it was necessary to do it, and in the original bill we provided that if any taxpayer was making substantially less than the average of the business in which he was engaged upon, that being made to appear to the Secretary of the Treasury, he would be authorized to permit him to have an exemption the average profits of representative concerns in the line of business in which he was engaged. The Senator will see under the application of that provision in most instances the man or concern making subnormal profit in the prewar period would be entitled to an exemption of probably more than 6 per cent upon his invested capital. So by the minimum provision of the new amendment practically little revenue can be lost in the case of the concern making before the war less than 6 per cent upon its capital. I say this because I think our provision as originally written, applying the provision to which I have just referred, namely, the average profits of like business, would have raised the exemption of nearly everybody above 6 per cent upon the capital.

Again, Mr. President, it was necessary to take care of the man making subnormal profits before the war when we applied the rigid rule of actual profits during that period. There were many cases—the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] possibly in his own experience will know of some—where the earnings of corporations during some of those years were nominal, where in some of those three years there was an actual loss. I found a great many cases like that in connection with the cotton mills of my State where during one of the three years we had selected there was no money made, but instead a loss was sustained. Manifestly one bad year would cut the average down, the average for the whole, while bad years out of the three would still further reduce it.

So, Mr. President, every consideration of fair play led your committee to provide for the case of a man who was making very little profit, a subnormal profit, during the three test years. To summarize, I do not think by reason of the minimum provision of 6 per cent we will lose much revenue. We may lose a little, but not much.

Mr. HUSTING. I agree with the Senator there is an element of fairness in this bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator pardon me long enough to let me present the other side?

Mr. HUSTING. I just want to ask the Senator this question for the purpose of getting it in the Record for the information of Senators—at least I should like to get the information. Will the Senator show how much more capital will be subject to taxation and the consequent amount of net excess revenue?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can state that in general terms. My information is, from the rough calculation of the experts, that by virtue of this amendment we will subject about one billion and a quarter of profits to taxation which under the original bill would have escaped taxation.

Mr. HUSTING. How much will we lose under the 6 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not that segregated.

The point I was making was that we are not going to lose much, if any, from the minimum, taking into consideration the provision which we had in the original bill to take care of a man who was making abnormal profits. Now, where are we going to get this enormous additional sum of money that the Government experts estimate we will get by reason of these new amendments, especially and chiefly the maximum and minimum amendment? Necessarily we are going to get it from that class of taxpayers who before the war were making large profits, ranging far above 10 per cent, some 25 and 30 and 40 per cent. In my own State, as the result of some investigations that I have had recently made, I have found numbers of corporations that before the war were making from 10 to 20 per cent or more upon their capital. The main part of this revenue will be obtained by imposing this limitation, which in effect provides that if a concern was making a large profit before the war, ranging up to the high rates I have spoken about, by reason of that fact it would be entitled to a large exemption, cutting it down, whittling it down, and allowing as an exemption a profit of only 10 per cent. There is where we are going to get it. We get it from the larger corporations.

It is true, Mr. President, you can pick out some large corporations that were not making 6 per cent before the war. You can pick out the railroads. They were not making an average of 6 per cent before the war. They will not be caught by this maximum provision and they will not be let out by this minimum provision. I could name possibly other classes of corporations that would not be caught under this provision, but I venture to say, taking all the representative corporations of this country, you will find that more than half of them will have their tax increased, many of them tremendously increased, as the result of this 10 per cent limitation.

Mr. President, since this limitation was placed in the bill I have been receiving, as I have no doubt every other member of the committee has, scores of letters from concerns that were making more than 10 per cent before the war complaining that we have so changed the bill as to impose upon them and others alike situated an excessive and burdensome tax.

The Senator picks out some companies which he says will not pay any more under this new provision than under the original committee plan. He picks out first the Steel Corporation. The United States Steel Corporation was not making relatively a very great profit in 1916 upon its inflated capitalization. Under our amendment this inflation, this water, will be squeezed out. The Secretary of the Treasury in the administration of this law can either cut its capital down to just and righteous figures or he can say to it, "You have got to take a fair estimate of your capital or take the exemption of the provision of the law for like corporations."

The Senator from Wisconsin says the Steel Corporation will not have to pay any more under our 60 per cent rate than it would have had to pay under our 50 per cent rate. That is true with reference to their earnings for 1916. The calculations he has been speaking about are all predicated upon its earnings for 1916. In 1916 these were $270,000,000. Its exemption was about $70,000,000. Thus, upon the basis of its earnings in 1916, the basis the Senator from Wisconsin has referred to, they had not made sufficient profit in excess of their prewar profits to take them up to 50 per cent, or the highest rates of the original bill. Their profits for that year took them up to only the rate of tax imposed upon corporations which would pay at the 45 per cent rate.

But, Mr. President, that is a mere calculation based upon a past year. The question is, What will this bill produce this year? What will be the effect of the 60 per cent rate upon the Steel Corporation upon its earnings in this year? We can estimate the earnings of the Steel Corporation for this year only from the first two quarters of this year. Based upon the earnings of these quarters the Steel Corporation itself has given out through that great mouthpiece of the big corporations, the Wall Street Journal, a statement of its net earnings for 1917 as being not $271,000,000, as in 1916, but $490,000,000. After the deductions are subtracted, their taxable profits will be many hundred per cent over and above the profits of the prewar period, or the 10 per cent exemption, and enable the 60 per cent rate to reach them.

Mr. President, the Senator had the earnings and taxable profits of a number of corporations calculated by the committee expert upon the basis of the bill as it is proposed to amend it—upon the basis of the change which the amendment of the Senate committee makes. There are, I believe, 20 of these corporations. He picked out and read from the estimates as to the Steel Corporation, based on earnings of 1916—not 1917—and tried to have the Senate believe there would be no substantial increase as a result of these new amendments, and yet the third corporation in the table that he had—if he had had sufficient time, I could have shown that the third corporation named in the table, namely, the Du Pont corporation—will have to pay by virtue of this 10 per cent maximum limitation $10,000,000 more than it would under the original provision of the bill.

Now, I am not going through them all. Here is another of the corporations in the table, the General Motor Corporation, which will pay one million and a half dollars more than it would have paid under the original bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought possibly the Senator had the figures there and could tell us what the tax of the Steel Corporation would be on the basis of $490,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator wants it, I will put it in the Record. It is a lengthy table.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I just want that one item. What would the Steel Corporation pay on its estimated revenues of $490,000,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. I asked the expert a little while ago to make a calculation, and he has just this minute handed me his calculation. He says it will be $183,734,000 upon their estimated profits for the year 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. After deducting the 10 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. After deducting its prewar profits.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Can the Senator state what the Steel Company would pay under the former method provided in the bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not calculated that, but the expert says to me that it would be the same, because they would be caught, as the Senator will see, by the 60 per cent upon any basis of calculation.

The Senator had here in his hand tables covering 20 different corporations, showing how this change would affect them. The Senator picked out some of those corporations and stated the effect, as he claimed, of the amendments, of the tax they would pay; but the Senator did not give, as I recall, the total result of the application of this new principle in the bill to those 20 corporations. I will do so now for him. The total result of the application of the minimum and the maximum amendments, against which he declaims, will be an increase in the revenue of the Government on part of them of $25,711,000 and to reduce them $4,575,000 on another part. From the application of this amendment, and the other amendment which we reported raising the rate to 60 per cent, upon these 20 corporations the net result will be that from the 20 corporations selected by the Senator—and they are largely corporations that lend themselves to his theory and his contention—by virtue of these amendments which he condemns, while claiming that he wants increased taxes upon this class of corporations, the Treasury of the United States will get $21,136,000 more money than it would under the original bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Out of those 20 corporations?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I am not at all interested in the intellectual combat going on between the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from North Carolina, nor as to who shall win in the particular contest, but the thing that is perfectly bewildering to an onlooker in Vienna is why the committee did not discover these facts during the eight weeks it was investigating the subject. If this matter is brought out now in good faith and can stand the test, there ought to be something in the way of an explanation as to why the former proposition was brought here and had the same earnest, faithful support of the same Senators who are now supporting the pending committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have on two occasions—first, in my reply on Saturday to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and, I think, in my reply the other day to the Senator from Alabama—gone fully into this matter. I then stated frankly that, in the first instance, the committee decided and thought in that decision it interpreted correctly the sentiment of the country, that this should be made distinctively a war tax; and the committee felt that if it were to be distinctively a war tax, based on war profits, then whatever profits, little or much, made before the war should be deducted before the tax should apply.

I then explained that at the time the bill came into the Senate our greater needs for money became more evident in this Chamber and throughout the country. It was called to the attention of the committee that Senators on both sides of the Chamber, and many prominent and influential people throughout the country, thought that, in view of the enormous requirements of the Treasury of the United States, the tax should be levied not only as a war-profits tax but be made as well an excess-profits tax; that we should not only tax that which was in excess of what a man made before the war but if a man before the war made more than the amount thought to be a reasonable profit, measured by the experience of the business of the country, he should not be permitted more than that amount as a deduction. That figure was variously placed at 8, 10, and 12 per cent. Mr. President, as I then stated, yielding to that sentiment and demand, we changed the tax from a war-profits tax to a combined excess-profits tax and a war-profits tax; so that now it is a composite system catching indirectly but effectually a part of the peace profits of the taxpayer and taxing them and catching all of his war profits and taxing them.

I do not think anybody can have any doubt about why the committee did it nor what has been accomplished as the result of doing it.

Without any reference to what my opinion is as to what was the correct and scientific and logical way to frame this tax, Mr. President, I have always made it a rule of my life to be governed by the circumstances of a situation in matters of policy and expediency; and when it was brought home to me that more money was needed, that the country did not desire that any man, however great his profits before the war, should have an exemption of more than 10 per cent, I yielded to that, and the committee yielded to it; and in yielding, Mr. President, we have increased the estimated yield of this bill by about $470,000,000 as the result of the maximum and minimum amendment and $70,000,000 by raising the graduated rate from 50 to 60 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, was there any possible doubt about what the desire of the country was in the first instance as to meeting these expenses as nearly as we could out of large profits?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, neither the country nor the Senate had given any expression about that when we made the first provision. When we made the first provision the Government was asking for only $5,000,000,000. The demand went up then to $10,000,000,000. While we were considering the bill, just before we had adopted these amendments in controversy, the Secretary of the Treasury sent in another estimate, which increased the amount asked for by a billion and a half dollars for aviation, ship construction, and so forth.

Mr. President, it is astounding to me that the Senator from Wisconsin, who says he wants to raise more money by taxation and wants to get it from swollen profits of the rich and the great corporations, wants to get it from great war profits, should when we bring in a bill that will get $500,000,000 more, and get it from profits exceeding 10 per cent upon invested capital, get it from the war profits of these great corporations, should rise in his seat in this body, inveigh against the bill, and not only strive to defeat this provision of it but throw out all sorts of insinuations with reference to the committee and the motives of individual members of it. His conduct in this regard is incomprehensible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	McNary	Simmons
Bankhead	Hollis	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Borah	Husting	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is absent on account of illness and that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I feel that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will seriously affect the business and commercial interests of my State. As a taxing proposition, I believe it is unwise and unjust. I have the honor to represent in part an industrial State, and I believe that the effect and result of the proposed amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin will not only be reflected against the commerce and industrial life of my State, but that they will be reflected likewise against the industries and commerce of every State in the Union. Particularly am I opposed to it because I do not believe that it fairly treats the smaller corporations. New Jersey has many of these, as well as have the adjoining States of New York and Pennsylvania. The interests of those three States industrially are intertwined one with the other.

The proposition to tax 72 per cent, Mr. President, on profits in excess of 10 per cent is almost vicious. In my opinion, it will result in the closing down of practically all of the smaller corporations in the State, and I believe even the percentages of taxation imposed by the committee will seriously affect our industries.

I feel, Mr. President, that at this time it is unnecessary to impose that basis of taxation. There is a danger point, Mr. President, in the range of the percentage of taxation, and if we go beyond that point there will ensue an industrial panic in this country. Surely that danger point is below 72 per cent of the net profits in excess of 10 per cent. I feel that at this time, when the Government needs the full capacity of every industry in the country, when the industries of the State of New Jersey are running night and day to furnish military equipment to the Government, to impede or impair those industries by a dangerous percentage of taxation will not only impede our cause but will practically make certain the victory of Germany at this time.

Mr. President, the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 and, to some extent, the year 1914 in New Jersey were years of depression; the manufacturers of the State were making very little money. I have in mind a shoe factory in the city of Newark, the manager of which told me during the campaign last fall that during the years mentioned he practically made no money; that he had few men employed, and that in 1913 when the 10 per cent tariff was taken off shoes, foreign manufacturers came to this country and bought the intricate shoe-making machine, the product of the United Shoe Manufacturing Co., took back American leather and American lasts and flooded the American market with foreign-made shoes, thereby creating a competition which closed that factory. But when the war started, and the European competition was removed, orders immediately began to flow into that establishment to supply the demand to the home trade, and to-day that plant is running night and day, not making munitions, not making ammunition, but taking care of the home trade in this country, which, by reason of the removal of foreign competition, by reason of the barrier created by the war, has again been opened to American manufacturers. It is proposed to tax that factory 72 per cent to-day, it having had no prewar profits. That percentage of taxation is unjust; for their success most certainly is not based upon any "swollen war profits."

We have in New Jersey many large glass factories. The same condition existed in connection with that industry as in connection with the shoe trade to which I have referred. Prior to the war those factories were practically closed down; but when the war came and competition of German and Belgium glassware plants was removed, when the demand in the American market was created for American goods, those establishments began to supply the American market.

I have in mind one factory in New Jersey that makes laboratory supplies, test tubes, and various articles of glassware used in hospitals and laboratories. When the demand was created in this country that plant started to work night and day and it is working on that basis now. They have taken the profits derived from the business and have enlarged their plants; they have increased the number of their employees, and it is now one of the most prosperous industries in South Jersey. Last fall a man employed in that factory handed me a little glass stopper saying "Previous to the war I was making from $10 to $12 a week piecework, cutting this glass stopper; but by reason of the war, and the protection created, whereby Germany can not now compete with our American labor, I am earning $30 a week making that glass stopper." Then he asked, "Are you willing to protect me in my labor and the wages that I am making because of this changed condition?"

Mr. President, that factory had no prewar profits, and yet it is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to take 72 per cent of the profits of that manufacturing concern. There are hundreds of such manufactories throughout the State in the same condition, and I tell you that they can not stand that percentage of taxation. I do not believe that they have the cash on hand to pay as high a percentage as that.

There is another infant industry which has been created in that State by reason of the fact that the German market for various acids and coal-tar products, of which the German producer had practically had a monopoly prior to this war, has been closed. Through the efforts of American genius the factories of this country are now extracting from coal tar or the coke of the steel mills various coal-tar products, of which there are hundreds. We are making picric acid in this country, a product which we never made before; we are making various ingredients for high explosives; and we are learning to make the dyestuffs which Germany practically controlled previous to the war. There are some 40 dye concerns in this country, one of which is the Du Pont Co., of which we have heard so much during the past few days in the debate. The Du Pont Co. to-day are experimenting in their various laboratories making dyestuffs in order that their plants, which before the war practically employed a minimum number of hands and now employ a maximum number, may continue in operation after the war and in order that the enlargements and extensions which have been made by reason of the demands of the war may be used and utilized for the dyestuff industry. A part of the profits of this concern are being utilized to make those experiments. In my State the Du Pont Co. has four plants, employing approximately, prior to July, 1914, 3,000 hands. When the war broke out a great demand for powder was created, and the allies came here and relied upon American genius and American enterprise to supply their demands. So these plants were expanded until in my State the four plants to which I have referred to-day employ 25,000 men; villages and cities have sprung up around these plants; they are running at full capacity. I am willing, Mr. President, to tax these establishments heavily, but let us not deal them such a blow as will prevent their proper expansion for future requirements of the industrial world and of the Nation at large.

Mr. President, it is not my fortune to belong to the distinguished profession, the law, of which my father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were honored members. Such being the case, I can not, in analyzing this monumental measure, take the viewpoint of the trained legal mind, as have 75 per cent of my colleagues in this Chamber.

Instead it is my fortune to occupy the position of the plain business man, destiny having marked out for me a commercial career. Therefore, in considering this bill, in passing judgment upon it, in reaching a conclusion concerning its merits, I can only do so from the point of view of a business man, one who from time to time has been in close touch with the currents of trade, with fingers upon the pulse of commercial and industrial energy.

It is, Mr. President, a singular world, a singular age, in which we live. Is prosperity a crime? Should success be penalized? Is that man who has, by his strenuous labors, acquired a competency, or even more, to be considered a pariah among his neighbors? Is the finger of scorn to be pointed at him as he passes along life's highway?

One might think so, after sitting upon this floor a few weeks and listening to the anathemas pronounced upon those Americans who have succeeded in life, who have a balance in bank, who have attained prominence and power in the world of commerce.

This is an amazing proposition, it seems to me, Mr. President.

Here comes a man who, beginning at the lowest rung of the ladder, has advanced to the top; has built up a successful business as merchant, manufacturer, or financier; has acquired wealth for himself, and, to a greater or less extent, for his associates and employees in business; is a substantial factor in commercial life, a pillar in the social fabric of his country.

Yet, as he passes along, some of those in high places and low cry out, "Stop thief!" "Away with him; release unto us Barabas!" "Crucify him!"

And who are the men who raise this hue and cry? Not the industrious mechanic, whose heart is sound and whose brain is cool, who entertains no jealousy of wealth, realizing, as he does, that capital and labor are industrial Siamese twins, and that he who severs the ligament which binds them together deals a mortal blow, not to one but to both. Furthermore, the far-sighted bread winner, familiar with the antecedents of his chief, knows that not many years previously the latter was himself only a wage earner, whose advancement can not but serve to stimulate the ambition of all other toilers to strive after a kindred degree of success.

I can not consent to this proposition, Mr. President. I agree with the senior Senator from Massachusetts, who the other day said:

I do not think honest business success is a crime.

No man in this Chamber will be readier than I to antagonize and legislate against trusts or combinations in restraint of trade, or any insidious influence backed by great wealth, whose purposes are hurtful to public policy or the welfare of the Nation as a whole.

But as a business man myself I realize the stupendous influences which have made this the greatest Nation on the face of the earth, which have made it prosperous beyond precedent and beyond comparison, and I have no patience with that element in our population which looks askance upon the man who has won in the struggle for existence, and seeks to array against him those who have been less successful.

No matter how eminent America's statesmen have been, her captains of industry have been even larger factors in the building of the Nation.

And even to-day, Mr. President, I can not agree or sympathize with those who have assailed and are still assailing the manufacturers of munitions and implements of warfare as though they were the enemies of civilization and objects of universal contumely. Except for these men, the ruthless despot of Central Europe would now have the world supplant at his feet, and America's shores would be threatened with invasion.

Moreover, thanks to the business foresight and capacity of these men, this Nation is about to equip itself for its sublime rôle, of putting an end to autocracy and restoring peace and democracy to the world. Except for them, we should to-day be the laughingstock of all nations.

It is the fashion among certain censorious public men, chiefly from the West and South, to rail against the munition makers of the East as coiners of "blood money," because, forsooth, they have supplied weapons to the forces in the Old World who are striving to rid the earth of autocracy and militarism.

How about the planters of the South who during the past three years have shipped tens of thousands of bales of cotton to Germany, through Scandinavia and Holland, for the making of high explosives? How about the owners of copper, iron, and lead mines in the West, who have furnished many thousands of tons of ore to all the belligerents for warlike purposes? How about the farmers of the prairie States, who have supplied millions of bushels of wheat to the central European nations, thus enabling them to prolong the war?

If the revenues of eastern manufacturers may properly be denominated "blood money," then shall I insist that the cotton planters, the mine owners, and the wheat producers of the South and West be placed in the same category.

If America is right to-day in its defense of democracy, if we are fighting a just cause, then the captains of industry who built and expanded these great plants, the stockholders who furnished the capital, the artisans who kept the wheels in motion, these men constitute the advance guard of the Nation's Army, recruited to deal the finishing stroke to Germany, who for three years has sought to enslave the world.

I am not a defender of or apologist for these men. Their acts speak for themselves. Their contemporaries, or certain of them, may treat them ungenerously. It is my belief that history will be more kindly.

The question we are dealing with in this bill is one of economic necessity. It should not be approached with passion, prejudice, or partisan feeling. The question before the Senate is not so much how we should tax or where we should tax, but how heavily at this time we may impose these burdens on the people without checking the normal ebb and flow in the channels of commerce and industry.

The question is not how little we can tax the people, but how much with safety and without weakening the capital needed to equip America at this time for the stupendous task which confronts her. A country's life is her productive capacity. Cur-tail, hamper, demoralize this and commercial chaos follows.

During the 30 years that I have been identified with the business life of America I have seen many periods of depression as well as expansion, due to the great upheavals that periodically occur in the commercial and industrial life of a nation. I have watched the effects of changing tariff policies, of new and experimental legislation, of fire, flood, earthquakes, war, and labor difficulties.

I am not referring to the effects of these shocks upon Wall Street or the stock market generally, but to the rise and fall of the barometer of finance, industry, and commerce.

Naturally, Mr. President, it is such men—the business men and manufacturers—such interests, who must pay by far the major portion of the war debt. The country expects it and they expect it.

But in this connection I wish to utter a note of warning, a word of caution.

"Conscript wealth," but do not confiscate it. Tax the rich, but do not tax to death. Tax, but not to the degree that the business of the Nation is crippled, lest industrial and financial disaster may ensue and there be nothing left to tax.

Let us not shackle trade; let us not stifle industry; let us not destroy confidence, which is the very essence and spirit and life of business.

In much of our war legislation we have placed the manacles of Government regulation upon business. To a very great extent this is necessary. Nevertheless, it is to be hoped that in all cases these regulations may be in the hands of practical men and not doctrinaires fresh from our universities, whose feet are on the earth, but whose heads are in the clouds.

There is one subject, Mr. President, upon which the Nation at large desires information. If it is supplied, and quickly, it will materially aid in tranquillizing and stabilizing the business world, in subduing the restless pulse of trade, and in preventing an irreparable outbreak in our commercial system.

We have a right to inquire at this time, it seems to me, whether the extraordinary policy of business control, of confiscating the proceeds of industry, in the United States is to go on after peace is restored. We see hints in certain editorials which suggest that the burdens now being laid upon business, and which are willingly accepted by business because of the great emergency, are but the beginning of a permanent socialistic propaganda.

What I would like to know, Mr. President, is this: Are we legislating for the war period or for posterity? I am willing, Mr. President, to help "make the world safe for democracy," but I am not willing to help make it safe for socialism. Socialism is no more the twin brother of true democracy than is autocracy.

The laws of trade are centuries old, and can not be manipulated or changed at will by the tyro, no matter how ambitious or patriotic his intentions may be. The arteries of commerce and finance are delicate in texture, and can be easily disarranged, resulting in unspeakable disaster.

In view of the passage of these regulatory laws, in view of the enactment of this measure, placing unprecedented burdens upon the business men of the Nation, I feel constrained, Mr. President, to urge upon this Senate the necessity of going slow hereafter, to the end that no radical upheaval in trade may be precipitated, with a possibility of financial chaos as a sequence.

I trust, Mr. President, that Senators may not be disposed to denominate this merely a potential, an imaginary, peril. It is a real one, and any keen business man of the Nation, either East or West, will so declare. It is only such a man, familiar with the mobile and fluctuating currents of finance and commerce who can be depended upon to formulate accurate judgments upon such matters.

This Congress may, by ill-considered legislation, based upon an inadequate knowledge of conditions in the business world, bring about commercial depression and commercial anarchy. Congress, by a stroke of the pen, in the twinkling of an eye, may bring to pass a state of affairs which years alone can adjust and correct.

Imperatively necessary is it during this war that the currents of industrial activity shall not become stagnant; that the machinery of commercial energy shall not become rusted or corroded by reason either of slackness or a complete collapse. A superlative degree of productiveness must prevail, or the country's necessities will not be provided for, to the great demoralization of the Nation's war program, and the embarrassment of our citizens generally.

In indicating, Mr. President, my solicitude lest business depression may ensue as a result of our deliberations upon this bill or any other legislation we may enact, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I have not alone in mind the merchant or the manufacturer. These will suffer infinitely less than will the immense army of wage earners, dependent upon them for their livelihood.

The shutdown of a mine, the closing of a factory, the locking of the doors of an industrial plant of any kind affects not merely the heads of such establishments, but the tens of thousands of their employees, and the scores of thousands of wives and sons and daughters of the latter.

In considering the merits of this bill, Mr. President, I would particularly urge that a deaf ear be turned toward those who would suggest class legislation during this war. Genuine patriotism, full-blooded Americanism, knows no such thing as class.

I cordially indorse and emphasize this sentiment of a fellow Senator:

I believe under a democracy that just as every man is bound to offer his services for the defense of the country in time of war, every man is bound to make his contribution to the expenses of the Government, if it is not more than 10 cents.

At a very early stage of this war, when the conscription bill was being debated, those of us who advocated the passage of that measure took the ground that dependence upon volunteer service was antagonistic to pure democracy, which only prevailed where universal service was resorted to.

That is the spirit upon which this war is being conducted by the Executive and by Congress. As we know no class, either rich or poor, in the military arm of the Government, so, likewise, in the imperatively necessary concomitant of military duty, the raising of the "sinews of war," the same rule must apply—all must spend or be spent, if need be, to carry on the struggle in behalf of civilization.

Yet I have been amazed, Mr. President, at the proposition which I have heard advanced on this floor, that only a handful of our citizens, comparatively speaking, should finance this war, which would assuredly be the case if taxation were limited to two sources, the income tax and the war-profits tax.

I have heard such un-American, such undemocratic, sentiments uttered in this Chamber by Senators who object, among other items, to the pitifully inconsequential tax on coffee, tea, cocoa, and sugar, amounting to only $70,000,000, less than one-half the amount a single corporation will pay under this bill into the Government Treasury.

If that were done then hundreds of thousands of Americans—who will pay tax in no other form—will make no financial contribution whatever toward carrying on the war.

I am not willing to believe that the type of Americanism of these hundreds of thousands is at so low an ebb that they are disposed to play the rôle of slackers in that regard and willing to withhold their mite from the Public Treasury upon which such stupendous demands have been made, and still will be made, in order to prosecute the war to a successful issue.

We shall send to the trenches in France 1,000,000 of our young men, 2,000,000 probably, not to fight the battles of France or of Great Britain, but our own, to the end that we shall not find it necessary later on to raise an army of 5,000,000 men to fight on American soil against a German army victorious abroad.

If we send 2,000,000 young men to France we will still have in America 8,000,000 of the same age, between 21 and 31, and still other millions younger than the minimum age and older than the maximum, who would not contribute a penny of taxes in any form, except for these so-called "consumption taxes."

We hear much about "conscripting the young blood of the Nation," yet those who are so solicitous concerning the lads in France, and those who are yet to sail, would exempt their brothers at home from all participation in the war and make them literally slackers, shirkers, and laggards in this great struggle for the preservation of the Nation.

It is altogether proper that the wealth of the Nation should bear the greater part of the war burdens, that it should be "conscripted," so to speak, in a manner and to a degree that is fair and equitable.

I am quite sure that the men of substance, of property, are keenly alive to the dangers which threaten the Nation in the event that Germany should establish dominance over the world. They are willing to make the sacrifices necessary to bring success to our arms.

I denounce the sentiment that these men are not patriotic, for the highest type of patriotism to-day is found in the persons of these vigorous Americans and of their sons, many of whom now wear the uniform of their country.

"Lest we forget"—and forgetfulness seems inherent in the human organism—I beg, in this connection, to call attention to the fact that when the liberty loan was floated, when the $100,000,000 Red Cross fund was raised, the capitalists of the country, the commanding figures in the domain of finance, were prompt and generous in their responses and those vast enterprises were unqualified successes.

Furthermore, look about you in Washington to-day and you will see a remarkable army of expert organizers, some of the most virile, most dominating, factors in our financial and commercial life, not a few of them members of the maligned coterie of millionaires, who have given up control of their own business affairs at home, have abandoned family, ease, and peace of mind to aid without remuneration of any sort the President in his stupendous task of mobilizing the resources of the country to win the war for humanity.

So far as I am individually concerned, Mr. President, I am in favor of high income taxes and high war-profits taxes—just as high as may be compatible with the necessities of business. The business men of America are asking no special favors. But, as one who has been closely identified with the commercial life of the Nation for nearly a third of a century, I beg this Senate not to destroy the industrial expansion of the country; not to block the wheels of industrial progress.

Courage and confidence at this time go hand in hand. The one without the other is impotent. If you destroy the delicate fabric of business confidence, if you hamstring the Nation's credit, or the credit of her merchants and manufacturers, you paralyze the courage of the country.

The most ominous element in the situation in America to-day is found in the fact that there are certain disturbing factors in our political, social, and economic life which are inspiring discord, dissension, and open hostility against the Government and against its policies. If these are not checked promptly and vigorously the Nation will suffer in the development of her military program and in the effectiveness of her participation in the pending war.

In view of the Nation's peril at the present time, in view of the tremendous, almost superhuman, struggle which must ensue before the world is "made safe for democracy," it is with apprehension that we look out across our broad domain and discover so many ulterior and unscrupulous forces at work to undermine public opinion, public confidence, and public credit.

Let us turn from this picture and give ear to this clarion call from one who shares with former Congressman Gardner, of Massachusetts, the honor of being the father of the "preparedness" propaganda in America. I refer, it is needless to say, to Theodore Roosevelt, who said:

Stout of heart and pledged to the valor of righteousness let us stand foursquare to the winds of destiny, from whatever corner of the world they blow. Let us keep untarnished, unstained, the honor of the flag our fathers bore aloft in the teeth of the wildest storm, the flag that shall float above the solid files of a united people, a people sworn to the great cause of liberty and of justice for themselves and for all the sons and daughters of men.

In this spirit, Mr. President, every true American, in office and out, should abandon his individual preferences and jealousies, should cast aside all thought of sectionalism or of party, and throw his whole personality into the scale, that he may the more fully consecrate himself to his country and to humanity. He should mobilize and coordinate all his energies, to the end that he may render the fullest measure of service in this awe-inspiring national crisis.

To employ scriptural language, "Forgetting the things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before," let us press toward "the mark for the prize of the high calling" set before us—a complete victory over the forces of autocracy which would reduce the world to chains.

If "whom the gods would destroy, they first make mad," then the doom of the crowned paranoiac of central Europe is rapidly approaching. The Kaiser's hymn of hate has become the swansong of an expiring dynasty. The end may be a year distant, and probably is, but the result is inevitable. Civilization will be triumphant; democracy will prevail.

There is but a single course open to the genuine lover of his country. Disassociating himself from every entanglement or obligation, from every ambition or prejudice, which might interfere with his supreme duty in this national crisis, let him serve his country in the trenches or out, with a rifle on his shoulder or his purse in his hand, fighting or paying, thus aiding in the winning of the war.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The Secretary called the name of Mr. ASHURST, and he voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I tried to get recognition from the Chair before the Chair submitted the question. I want to suggest the absence of a quorum. There are some Senators absent who want to be here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call has begun.

Mr. NORRIS. But, Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I was addressing the Chair for that purpose before the Chair made the statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, of course, did not see the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I was right in front—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order is overruled. The Secretary will proceed with the calling of the roll.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I appeal from that decision.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. PENROSE. That can not be done during the roll call.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides that the appeal is not in order during the roll call. The Secretary will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is unavoidably absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). In view of the announcement just made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] I feel at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family. The pair announced by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] will stand.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GERRY. I have a general pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I understand that if present he would vote as I do, and I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am informed that he would vote as I would on this proposition. Therefore, being at liberty to vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I understand that if present he would vote as I have voted. Therefore I allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STERLING. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. Were he present he would vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS], who, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] because of illness. I am informed that if present he would vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILMAN]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM].

Mr. KING subsequently said: I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. I supposed he was in the Chamber when the last vote was taken, and, laboring under that impression, I voted. Under that pair I ought not to have voted; and, announcing that fact, if it is permissible, I will ask leave to withdraw my vote.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have no objection to the Senator voting. I was in my office, but for some reason or other my clerk did not hear the bell ring. There is no objection.

Mr. KING. Then I am very glad to allow my vote to stand. The result was announced—yeas 20, nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—20.

Ashurst	Hollis	Kenyon	McNary

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment. I propose to change the amendment submitted by the committee by striking out of that amendment all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and inserting after the parenthesis in line 13, page 12, the words:

Sixty-five per cent upon war profits, determined as hereinafter provided.

It is in the same form as the amendment that has just been voted upon by the Senate, with only the difference that where the rate proposed in that amendment was 70 per cent the rate which I now propose is 65 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt the debate is in effect closed so far as results are concerned, but I desire to submit a few observations before this amendment is voted upon. I have spoken heretofore upon this subject, and I would not trespass upon the patience of the Senate longer were it not for the fact that I feel there are some things which have particular application to the amendment which is now offered, it being, as I understand, a 65 per cent rate.

I called attention the other day to the fact that the expenditures this year would likely amount to $19,000,000,000. A few days have elapsed, and according to the statement now published as coming from the Secretary of the Treasury it will amount in all probability to $21,000,000,000. The first estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury after the declaration of war for this year's expenditures was $6,400,000,000. An estimate made by a distinguished writer upon finance was $5,000,000,000.

In the course of a few weeks an estimate was made raising that to $11,000,000,000. I am speaking in round numbers. Finally a third estimate was made placing the figures at about $17,000,000,000. Now, according to the report to-day from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House, it is around $19,000,000,000, with a news item to the effect that for safety, to guard against a shortage, the Secretary of the Treasury has suggested an additional $2,000,000,000. Thus while we discuss the means of raising millions the estimates come in in billions. We do not deal with millions any more, except in tax or revenue bills; in all other matters we deal in billions.

I venture to say, Mr. President, not in criticism but as a statement of what I believe to be the fact, that the whole expenditure this year will be from twenty-two to twenty-three billion dollars, possibly $25,000,000,000, including, of course, the $7,000,000,000 which we are proposing to loan to the allies.

This bill in all probability by the time it receives the signature of the President will provide for about two and a half billion dollars, speaking in general terms and not undertaking, of course, to get down to details; certainly not more.

So, Mr. President, we are proposing to incur an expenditure of from twenty-one to twenty-five billion dollars, and we propose to raise by way of taxes in this particular measure two and one-half or two and one-fourth billion dollars.

I wish to say to the Members of the Senate that there is not in the record of history such a shrinking from duty on the part of a great legislative body as that which will thus be recorded against this body. There is not a single instance, from the wars of Napoleon until this hour, when men who had charge of the affairs of their country did not more adequately and substantially meet the situation than we are doing in this instance. I say this knowing full well how frail and inadequate have been some of the precedents. The Senate and the Congress of the United States in this war up until the present hour have met the situation apparently with courage and purpose and in amplitude of means, but when we reach the great question of taxation, which deals with that subject matter concerning which it is said that the American people are most sensitive, money and property, we shrink from the performance of what is our manifest duty in this instance.

I listened but a few moments ago to a somewhat pathetic plea upon the part of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] for the wealth of the country and men of wealth. If I supposed for a moment, Mr. President, that two and one-half billion dollars was the full amount which the men of wealth were willing to contribute to this war in the way of taxes as against the possible expenditure of twenty-one to twenty-five billion dollars—if I should assume that that was the standard and measure of patriotism among the men of wealth and power financially in this country, I should conclude that wealth had eaten away the first and noblest of the virtues of citizenship.

I do not believe that it is any measure of their patriotism. I do not believe, sir, that we are meeting the situation as those men themselves would meet it if they were here. I can not conceive that men who have gathered their millions, who are more interested than anyone else in a strong and firm Government, who are more interested than anyone else, if we measure by material things, in the success of this Government should close down after two years of marvelous profit and say that two and one-half billions dollars is the sum total of their capacity to meet this great exigency of our Republic. If such an indictment is to be brought, it will be brought by those who defend this bill, not by those who oppose it.

When the President read his declaration of war address he referred to this matter. I think it is extremely unfortunate that we have been so anxious to follow the President in other matters, but have manifested an unwillingness to follow him in this instance. The President said:

It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitably by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people so far as we may against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

Obviously it is our duty to protect our people against the very great hardship which inflation would bring to them, and which inflation, as we know, is accentuated and aggravated by these great war loans. The President, familiar with the experience of our Nation in the years gone by and the experience of other nations in regard to such matters, had in mind this idea of issuing a vast amount of bonds and collecting a small amount of taxes. So he early called attention to it. He has warned us early and unmistakably. I only regret that he has not seen fit during the pendency of this measure to reiterate his views; yet we should not have need of such reiteration.

I can not concede that the President was stating merely a naked and solitary economic abstraction. I take it that drawing from his experience and his observations and his reading he was stating that which is written upon every page of war's finance, that the most serious thing which confronts a people in such an instance is providing against the inflation which is superinduced by great war loans. Why is it that we refused in this instance to accept this wise suggestion? Why do we refuse in this instance to accept the views of the President, especially when he is supported by experience, by sound finance, and by conscience? Let me read a line from Mr. Lloyd-George in his first budget speech in 1914 along the same line:

War is the time for sacrifice in nations; they are in the spirit of sacrifice. It is a time when men know that they are expected to give up comforts, possessions, health, limb, life—all that the State requires in order to carry it through the hour of its trial. It is a time of danger, when men part willingly with anything in order to avert evils impending on the country they love, and I am perfectly certain that when there are millions of our countrymen volunteering to risk their lives men who can not volunteer are not going to grudge a fair share of their possessions. It is not merely a time of sacrifice, it is a time for the temper of self-denial, it is a time to ask the nation to make sacrifices. People who can not go and give their lives are anxious to do something else to assist, and I am perfectly certain I should be committing an unpardonable blunder against the highest interests of this country if, as chancellor of the exchequer, however disagreeable the task may be, I did not take this, the earliest possible opportunity, for submitting proposals that would enable people to contribute something toward carrying on the war in which the honor and life of their country are so deeply involved.

And so Mr. Lloyd-George laid upon the people of England an excess-profits tax in the very beginning of the war of 50 per cent. Without any previous years of fattening upon war, without any previous advantages growing out of war between other nations, with his industries as unexpectedly entering into war as did the nation, the then chancellor of the exchequer laid upon the industries of that country a 50 per cent tax. We, after two years of incalculable benefit from a financial standpoint derived from this great war, after we have gathered some $4,000,000,000 of war profits—that is, profits in excess of the profits which our people were enjoying before the war—with those untouched, we lay a tax which averages 31 per cent.

Do you think in all candor that that is meeting the situation? Do you think that that is responding to the call of our country? And I ask, above all, do you think it represents the standard of sacrifice which the business men of this country are willing to make?

But there came a time after two years of war—of grinding, decimating, destructive war—after their industries had been depleted of man power, after the industries had been filled up by children and women and old men, when they must lay on another tax. So they put on a tax of 80 per cent. Are we not better fitted to meet a tax of 80 per cent after having two years of unexampled prosperity than was England after having two years of war—of sudden, fearful war? Is there any comparison between our ability to meet such a tax and that which must have characterized England at the beginning of the third year of the war?

Now, notice what Mr. Bonar Law says in regard to the 80 per cent tax, a tax which has been criticized here as radical, as revolutionary, and as destructive of business and as calculated to make unpopular the war. Mr. Bonar Law, in his remarks upon this subject, said:

I propose to make the excess profits 80 per cent instead of 60 per cent, as it was before. * * * From the point of view of fairness there is nothing to be said.

Mr. Bonar Law is the chancellor of the exchequer, and after two years of sifting in the English Government, after testing and trying out the other able men of England, Mr. Law was called to the chancellorship. He is a business man, a man entirely familiar with business principles and business necessities, quite familiar with the industries of England. After a year of taxation of 50 per cent and a year at 60 per cent, and after two years of war, he lays on an 80 per cent tax, and then he says:

From the point of view of fairness there is nothing to be said.

Behold this Republic, with $225,000,000,000 of wealth, with $4,000,000,000 of war profits, with a people untouched as yet and unscathed by war, we lay on a tax averaging 31 per cent, and when men advocate a higher per cent they are charged with being unfair, radicals. The country needs a baptism of just such radicalism.

No one, I think, can consider for a moment that it is unfair to take so large a share of the profits which accrue in consequence of the war, profits which arise out of the war. Of course there are many cases, though not by any means a large proportion on the whole, in my opinion, where the profits are not due to war—

Of course that would be true in our instance—

but even there, from the point of view of fairness, when we consider what privations, from the point of view of income as well as in other directions, the great bulk of population is undergoing, I can not consider it unfair, or consider that anyone is badly used if he gets a larger income during the war than he got before.

Upon what possible theory can the able Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FREELINGHUYSEN] consider that the business men of New Jersey have reached a point of sacrifice when they are getting 20 per cent more in war than they were in peace? Upon what possible theory can he say that these men will break down in their business affairs and be discouraged and that it will render the war unpopular if they are making 20 per cent out of the war?

Mr. President, these are the views of men upon whom rest the great responsibilities of conducting this war, who are the heads of their several Governments. The President of the United States undoubtedly advocates a principle quite different from the one which we are following here.

We enter the contest after the tremendous advantage of two years of war profits and propose to lay a tax on an average of something above 31 per cent. Who are the slackers? We conscript our young men to fight and pass the burden of taxes on to the next generation! What marvelous manifestations of unrestrained patriotism! What sublime willingness to sacrifice shall characterize this generation on the pages of history!

What a pity that profits are not flesh and blood that we might without hesitancy lay the conscripting grip upon them and bring them to the support of the war! We would not approach the subject bowing and apologizing, but sternly and uncompromisingly.

Mr. President, I read some observations here from Prof. Sprague upon the great injustice to the masses of the people in issuing so large an amount of bonds in comparison with the amount of the taxes to be raised:

Borrowing as the principal means of financing the war, it will thus be seen, has some of the defects of paper money. Though not so directly nor to so great an extent, the borrowing policy is practically certain to involve a general advance in prices, which in turn increase the cost of a war and also cause much undesirable variation in incomes. Against war finance based on borrowing there are, however, other and far more serious objections. It is manifestly unjust and inequitable because it gives not only to property acquired before a war but also to income received during its progress a far higher degree of consideration relative to life than is accorded to them in times of peace. In adopting the borrowing policy a government accepts in the field of finance the voluntary principle without qualification. Interest as a reward is offered at whatever rate is required in order to secure the necessary funds. An analogous situation would present itself if governments relying entirely upon voluntary enlistment offered successive increases in the pay of soldiers whenever the supply of volunteers was inadequate.

The injustice of treating those who provide the funds for war purposes more generously than those who risk life itself will not be questioned. Consider for a moment the contrast under the borrowing method of war finance between a soldier in receipt of an income of $2,500 before a war and his neighbor who remains at home in continued receipt of a similar amount. The civilian reduces his expenditures in every possible way and subscribes a total of $4,000 to war loans. He is rewarded with a high rate of interest, to which his soldier neighbor must contribute his quota in higher taxes if he is fortunate enough to return to the front. The contrast becomes still greater if, as often happens, the income of the stay at home increases during the war and if he is able to secure a superior position. On the other hand, the soldier often finds it difficult to secure a position as good as that from which he was taken at the beginning of the war.

During a great war it would also seem that the chance of making large profits is not needed to secure persistent effort and readiness to assume business risks. Patriotic motives in the financial and business world even now in some degree take the place of ordinary economic motives, even though no strong appeal has been made to them. But it is also to be noted that business risks are far less than in times of peace, even under conditions as they develop when a war is financed by borrowing, and these risks would be still further reduced if the taxation policy were adopted.

Now, Mr. President, let us consider some figures. I wish those who feel nervous about business would just think of the condition which these figures disclose. I agree with what has been said here so often, that we ought not to destroy business; that we ought not to hamper business; that we ought not to render it inefficient.

It is essential that we do not do so; it is essential for the interest of the people, for labor, and for the country at large that we do not do so; all are agreed as to that general proposition; but I do not agree that the business men of the country and the wealth of the country must not make their sacrifice. I maintain, sir, that when business efficiency and productivity are taken care of, from that time on they must make the same sacrifice as the man in the front line of battle as nearly as it is possible for them to do it.

I am not concerned with anything in this discussion other than the protection of business efficiency. The insidious appeal for a chance to make profits out of this war is worse than treason. To disloyalty of country it adds a low groveling greed. The only appeal that comes to me with force is, What will protect the business efficiency of our people? After that is answered, after business efficiency is protected, I do not hesitate to say upon the floor of the Senate, I would take every dollar of income above $100,000 of every man in the United States until the sacrifices of war were over. In doing so I would count myself the servant of the Republic, the friend and protector of the only kind of citizenship which can sustain a Republic.

Until this great war shall have closed and the sacrifice is at an end—I would not hesitate to lay the taxing hand of the Government upon any man who claimed to enjoy more than that while the war is going on. If we leave his business so that it may run and produce and give us what we want in the way of production, then from that time on I would ask of him to make sacrifice as nearly as possible approximating that of the man who is at the front.

Let us see what amount of profits could be made under this amendment. I have had some figures made based upon the estimated earnings of 1916. The figures would be much larger if they were based upon the estimated earnings of 1917. For instance, the Du Pont Powder Co., to which the Senator from New Jersey referred, would have, after it had paid this tax under the 65 per cent provision, $35,692,312.20. Is that the sacrifice that business is going to be called upon to make during this war? While men are fighting and dying shall there be left in our country a large class of people who shall not only go through the war unscathed but shall gather from the terrible ordeal $35,000,000 annually to store away, with which to create vast estates for the future? Does the Senate of the United States want to stop at that kind of a standard of sacrifice?

Armour & Co., dealers in the necessities of life, will have, after they pay this tax, $11,656,916; quite sufficient to justify a man, if he was moved by love of gain, to wish this war would continue indefinitely; quite sufficient to cause those who care most for wealth to bear any grief that they might feel because somebody is fighting and dying at the front in order that their property may be protected in all future time by their Government. Are we radical? Are we revolutionary when we have such profits?

The Bethlehem Steel Co. after paying this tax would have $20,611,209; the Hercules Powder Co. would have $7,273,876; the United States Steel Corporation—and these figures, as I have said, are upon the profits of 1916—after paying this tax would have $157,342,883. Could there be any better investment for these people than an investment in war? Have they ever realized any such profit as that in time of peace?

Swift & Co., packers, would have left $13,736,000. Now, let me call attention to the further fact that both Armour & Co. and Swift & Co. issued in 1916, the year upon which these estimates are based, stock dividends, one to the amount of $50, 000,000 and the other to the amount of about $75,000,000. We leave Swift & Co. $13,000,000 in round numbers in cash and $75,000,000 stock dividend issued upon accumulated profits, and we leave Armour & Co. $11,000,000 and $80,000,000 of stock dividends.

The United Fruit Co. will have $7,966,639 left after paying the tax.

Mr. President, I might go on indefinitely and encumber the Record with these figures, which disclose the amount of profit which these companies would be realizing and enjoying after they have paid the tax covered by the present amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if his figures show the amount earned on the stock by the Du Pont Powder Co. last year?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. KENYON. I think it was about 120 per cent, was it not?

Mr. BORAH. I have not the details as to that.

Mr. KENYON. So that, even according to the Senator's figures, there would be some 60 per cent earnings on the common stock left to them.

Mr. BORAH. I made an estimate here, Mr. President, as to the United States Steel Corporation, upon the estimated profits for 1917 which it is supposed it will enjoy, in view of the returns from the corporation this far in the year. Taking out the tax covered by this amendment, its profits would be $188,730,191.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, what does the Senator estimate their profits are this year?

Mr. BORAH. The quarterly report showed earnings of $146,000,000 for the quarter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know whether the Senator heard the chairman of the committee say that he estimated, from the figures furnished the committee, that the profits of that corporation would be $490,000,000 this year.

Mr. BORAH. My figures are under the estimates of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho whether he has any detailed statement of the items making up the $21,000,000,000 or $23,000,000,000 of expenditures which he contemplates during the next year. I will state in that connection that I quite agree with him that if so large an expenditure is contemplated within the year a contribution of only two billion dollars and a half in the way of taxation by the wealth of the country would be inadequate, provided an increased contribution would not, as the Senator suggests, diminish the business efficiency of the country and to that extent its ability to prosecute the war. I am quite prepared to go to any extent, just as the Senator is, in conscripting incomes and wealth in order to carry on this war, but I am at a loss to know how $23,000,000,000 can be expended.

The Senator stated that seven billions of that twenty-three billions is for loans to foreign countries. That would leave sixteen billions. I have been making a rough estimate, while the Senator was speaking, as to what the extraordinary cost of this war will be for the maintenance of our Military Establishment above normal times, and if the Senator will permit me just a moment I will give this rough summary.

I have assumed that the Germans may make way, according to their boast, with a million tons of shipping a month. They have not as yet done it, but I have assumed they are going to do it during the next 10 months, and that we will have to supply the ships that will take the place of that tonnage. That would mean that we would have to expend at the cost of $100 per ton $1,000,000,000 for shipping.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that I have not myself undertaken to itemize this expenditure. I have accepted the figures as given to us by Mr. KITCHIN, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Are they given in any detail?

Mr. BORAH. They are given in the report which is on file—filed September 1.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I shall be through in just a few minutes. Will the Senator just let me make this summary here?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I have assumed here that we would have to spend a billion dollars in supplying additional tonnage. We are told that $600,000,000 should be spent for aviation. I have allowed a billion dollars for that. The expenses of our Army in normal times have been about $110,000,000 annually. Our Army is to be nearly ten times as great as it has been—a million men. I have multiplied, therefore, our annual expenditures by fifteen or sixteen, and made the administration of the Army cost two billions as against a prewar cost of one hundred and ten or one hundred and twenty millions. Then I have taken the Navy, which has not been very greatly increased, with its annual expenditure of $130,000,000, and I have multiplied that seven or eight times, and I find that it amounts to $1,000,000,000. Then I have assumed that we will have to spend for guns perhaps $2,000,000,000 more. That makes a total expenditure of $7,000,000,000. Now, what else is there to expend, except for ammunition, assuming that that is not included in the very large allotment of $2,000,000,000, which I have made for the general administration of the Army? And is the ammunition to cost the difference between seven billion and sixteen billion dollars?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we ought to have some more definite statement than has thus far been made of the probable expenditures of this war. It seems to me utterly beyond reason that this country, in the first year of the war, should expend an amount so largely disproportionate to the amount expended by the other great powers during any period of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I might agree with the criticism of the Senator from Nevada upon the expenditures which are being made; but that does not change the fact.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not know whether they are being made or not. This is an estimate, and it seems to me a large estimate, of what can be spent. Here we have, outside of the amount of money that is to be furnished as loans to foreign countries, according to the Senator's statement, $16,000,000,000, and all I can sum up by these extraordinary allowances, outside of ammunition, is about $7,000,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. May I interrupt the Senator from Idaho while he is speaking of specific figures, so that the RECORD may show and the country may know that on the floor of the Senate this morning it was stated by the chairman of the Finance Committee that the profits of the United States Steel Corporation for this year would probably be $490,000,000, that the tax levied under the committee amendment would bring in $183,000,000, and in our charity we give back to the United States Steel Corporation $307,000,000 this year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President—

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment, and then I will yield.

In answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a portion of the report filed by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means on September 1, 1917; and then I call the Senator's attention to the fact that since that time there has been what seems to be an authoritative statement from the Secretary of the Treasury adding $2,000,000,000 to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter referred to will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

At the present time the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918, made during the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, and the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, amount to $9,114,433,107.11, and the appropriations now contemplated for the fiscal year 1918, in addition to those already made, are likely to amount to $9,891,150,000, making a total of $19,005,583,107.11 for the fiscal year. It must be borne in mind, however, that $3,000,000,000 of the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 already made was for the purpose of extending credits to foreign Governments and that $4,000,000,000 of the contemplated appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 is for the same purpose and is provided for in section 2 of this bill, thus making a contemplated extension of credits of $7,000,000,000 to foreign Governments to be financed by the sale of bonds. Deducting from the total estimated appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 now made or contemplated the $7,000,000,000 proposed extension of credits to foreign Governments, $325,000,000 estimated receipts of the Post Office Department, and the $60,000,000 sinking-fund permanent annual appropriations which is never set aside, we find that the disbursements of the Government for the fiscal year 1918 to meet our ordinary and our war expenditures will be over $11,620,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury in his statement before your committee stated that the best estimate he was able to give of the probable necessary disbursements now authorized or contemplated for the fiscal year 1918, exclusive of the $7,000,000,000 extension of credit to foreign Governments, postal receipts, and the sinking-fund requirements, was $11,782,371,000. Assuming that the disbursements will be as great as the Secretary of the Treasury estimates, we find that after deducting the estimated receipts under existing law, estimated at $1,333,500,000, that the estimated ordinary and war expenditures will exceed the estimated receipts for the fiscal year 1918 by $10,448,871,000.

Of the bonds authorized by the act of April 24, 1917, there are available for the expenditure of our own Government only $2,000,000,000. Deduct this amount and the deficit will be $8,448,871,000. The expenditures in 1917 and the estimated expenditures in 1918, which are reimbursable by bond issues heretofore authorized, to cover the expenditures incident to the Mexican situation, the Alaskan Railway, the armor-plate plant, the nitrate plant, the Shipping Board, the Danish West Indies, and the naval emergency amount to $393,500,000. If the special authorization of bonds for those particular amounts is deducted, we will still have a deficiency of $8,055,371,000.

After careful consideration of the entire financial situation, and in view of the fact that the amount to be raised by taxes in the pending revenue bill is yet to be determined, your committee recommend that the legislation to be provided in this bill provide sufficient funds to cover the loans to foreign Governments and to amply safeguard the Treasury in case of emergency, and that the remaining legislation necessary to meet the expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 be postponed until the regular session, and until the pending revenue bill shall have been enacted into law.

The proposed bill authorizes a bond issue of $7,538,945,460. Of this amount $3,538,945,460 has already been authorized to be issued under the provisions of the act of April 24, 1917, but it is deemed advisable to provide that no further bonds in addition to the $2,000,000,000 heretofore issued or offered for subscription shall be issued under the provisions of the act of April 24, 1917, but to make the remaining bonds authorized issuable under the provisions of the proposed bill. The two chief reasons for this change are (1) to permit the issue of the remaining bonds at a higher rate of interest, not to exceed 4 per cent, and (2) to make the interest therefrom subject to the income additional taxes commonly called surtaxes and the excess profits or the war-profits taxes.

Of the $3,538,945,460 worth of bonds already authorized above referred to, $1,000,000,000 is authorized to be used to extend credit to foreign Governments, $2,000,000,000 is authorized to be used to meet our own Government expenditures, and $538,945,460 is authorized to reimburse the Treasury for Panama Canal disbursements, disbursements for the Danish West Indies, Alaskan Railway, naval construction, refunding the 3 per cent bonds maturing in 1918, and disbursements incident to the Mexican situation.

The remaining $4,000,000,000 is a new authorization, the proceeds from which are to be used in extending credits to foreign Governments.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $4,000,000,000 worth of certificates of indebtedness, payable within one year from the date of issue.

The bill also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $2,000,000,000 worth of war savings certificates maturing within five years from the date of issue.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will suggest to the Senator from Nevada that in the minority report on page 95 there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury sending in an estimate, and on page 97 there is a detailed statement showing that the appropriations for the Army for 1918 are $3,353,475,182.06, and that the estimates that are pending, that have been sent down to Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, amount not to $1,000,000,000, as the Senator's estimate is, but to $5,319,893,441.29; and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says they have been increased since then.

Mr. BORAH. I think there is no considerable difference of opinion as to the fact that while we can not see where this money is needed, those running the business do see where it is needed, and they are expending it because they know what they are spending, and what they will probably have to expend, and they report to us, and upon that we act; and we are not permitted to know anything more about it than that.

Mr. President, I regret to have imposed again upon the time of the Senate. I should not have done so had I not regarded this the most vital and far-reaching question since we conscripted the manhood of the Nation to fight for the honor and security of our country. I wish those men could feel as they march away, and as they fight, and as they shall return, those who shall return, that behind them and over and about them is a Government which demands equality in all its burdens in so far as human ingenuity can equalize those burdens. I regret more than I can express that we have not the foresight and the courage to demand of property and wealth a sacrifice equal to the demand we have made of men. I regret that in the great war of civilization, in the war for the preservation of free institutions, property and wealth seem more sacred to the Congress than flesh and blood. But it is plain that we are not going at this time to meet the situation as we should. I venture to believe, however, that before many months we will correct this serious blunder. We refuse now to listen to the eloquent tones of the younger Pitt warning us in his own words against the mistake we are making. We refuse now to heed the remorseless logic of Gladstone revealing the subtle evils of great bond issues. We refuse now to consider the example—the unfortunate example—of our Civil War admonishing us against timidity, weakness, and procrastination in the laying on of taxes in great emergencies, and finally we refuse now to listen to the voice of social justice appealing to us as men, as Senators, and as the representatives of the Republic of Washington and Lincoln, to withhold the burden the demoralizing miseries which unwise and unjust taxation, unnecessary bond issues, inflation, and high prices are to inflict upon the average citizen, not only of our generation but of generations yet unborn. We refuse now, I say, to listen to these things. We halt and hesitate, we apologize and procrastinate, but I venture to prophecy that in time we will see things differently, and that in time, and at no distant date, we will correct this blunder—the kind of blunder of which Napoleon in a supreme hour spoke.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the Senator from Idaho takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

We have loaned the allies about $3,000,000,000 and we have taken the bonds of those countries for security. Under the act of April 24 the President was authorized to do that. Now, if we continue to loan to the allies and continue to take their national bonds as security, is there any reason in the world why that indebtedness should not carry itself, especially if the United States guarantees the interest on those bonds? Do I make myself clear to the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator makes himself plain; but I do not see why the Senator takes issue with me.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have followed the Senator's argument with great interest. We have in the Treasury now $3,000,000,000 if the act of April 24 is carried out. Two billion dollars the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Knox] says. I think it is more than that. A loan of $3,000,000,000 was authorized. However, if we have $2,000,000,000 of the bonds of France and England and Italy in our Treasury, they are an asset, are they not? Those countries are not bankrupt and those countries will pay their national debt sometime, I hope. Suppose this Government guarantees the interest on that part of their debt owing to us, is our credit impaired? Is there any harm in passing that amount of our obligation on to the future? Is that wise financiering? If we are even obliged to float an American bond issue in order that we may extend their credit, taking security therefor, our posterity will not have to pay it. That debt will ultimately be paid by these great nations, and to that extent at least we ought not to be so seriously perplexed that confiscation is necessary.

If these foreign loans go to $7,000,000,000, and they may, well and good. Under the act by which these loans are made, securities are taken; the equivalent for every dollar we advance is in our hands and can be pledged if necessary. The interest and the principal are due from supposedly responsible governmental entities, and to that extent we have not burdened our people and should not be driven in desperation to violent extremes, although the burden is going to be heavy.

Now, this thought has been running through my mind in connection with the statement so often made in the Senate that a bond issue was undesirable. I think it is in the main undesirable. I think a large bond issue is going to go slowly; that it will not be readily absorbed by the people, especially if it is very large; and that the rate of interest must be higher than we have paid in many years in order that the bond issue may float; but so far as that part of our liability which arises out of loans to our allies is concerned, we have security now in the Treasury that should cut some figure in our calculation.

Mr. BORAH. It cuts just this figure, that I excepted from the amount of expenditures, some $25,000,000,000, $7,000,000,000 which would be loaned to the allies. That leaves about $18,000,000,000. If it is $21,000,000,000, it leaves $14,000,000,000 aside from the amount loaned to the allies. We are raising something over $2,000,000,000 by this bill, which is about one-seventh of the amount which we will expend outside of the amount which we will loan to the allies.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. BORAH. I did not include the $7,000,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But let me ask the Senator a straight, square question: Is it asking too much for the American Congress to pass on to future generations the amount of money loaned to our allies, for which we have received a substantial security?

Mr. BORAH. I have not assumed that it was unfair to pass on that particular portion. That was not a part of the basis of my argument.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator say it would be wise?

Mr. BORAH. If it were my own particular posterity, I should feel a little nervous in leaving certain expenditures which are being made in foreign Governments to be recouped to him. I think that as to a vast amount of this money, of course, certain nations will undoubtedly pay back. There are other Governments to which we loaned that we may not be able to find 30 days from now.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, that is probably an extreme statement.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is not an extreme statement, because nobody has been able to locate it yet, and there is no one in the Senate who knows to whom the money was loaned or who got it or how it was spent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the Senator, of course, does not mean to say that he can not locate the Government of Great Britain. He does not mean to say that he can not locate the Government of France and the Government of Italy. They are not wholly lost. This situation does not require a microscope, but a field glass and a commanding height will clearly reveal that those Governments are still intact, with their credit practically unimpaired.

Now, Mr. President, if their securities are in the Treasury of the United States in accordance with the requirements of law they are worth something. There is no one in this Chamber who would say they were not worth practically par. The bonds of Great Britain are not at a very low discount upon the market. The bonds of France and Italy are not being hawked about on our market at low prices. To be sure, since the war began—since 1913—about $60,000,000,000 have been added to the debt of the 40 leading countries of the earth, and that will continue to go on while this stress is upon them; but I say that those securities in our Treasury to-day are tangible assets, and if you, Mr. President, or the Senator from Idaho, were the Secretary of the Treasury, I believe you would undertake to get those securities out, rather than to issue the bonds of our own country at a high rate of interest.

If you could float that vast quantity of securities which we now hold in the Treasury the necessity of bonding the country would not now exist.

Personally, I have been won over to the idea that outside of the bonds now held in the Treasury as collateral and marketable, most of the money now needed should be raised through income tax. I would rather take these vast accumulations after they have been divided by a fair income-tax law than to do violence to the economical and industrial supremacy of our country.

I have never been an income-tax man. I voted against the income-tax amendment. I think it breeds discord, and it will array one class of people against another, and that the demagogue will make it a weapon for his own supremacy; inasmuch, however, as it has been embedded in the fundamental law of our country, if I had my way about it I would make it apply alike to every citizen of our country, rich and poor. I do not know what one-tenth of 1 per cent on all incomes might bring in, but I assume it would bring in a tremendous fund.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho, or has the Senator from Idaho the floor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thought the Senator had finished. I beg his pardon.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know who has the floor, but I wanted to say a word in order that I may not be misunderstood. The Senator, I think, knows I had no reference to the Government of Great Britain or France or Italy when I made that statement. I have no doubt those Governments will take care of the situation, and I sincerely trust that all the Governments will be as capable of taking care of the situation when the war is over as those Governments.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I did not misunderstand the Senator from Idaho, and, of course, would not misrepresent him. I yield. I had no idea of taking the floor, but now that I have it through the courtesy of the Chair, I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator just stated that he did not know what amount of income would be derived from a tax of one-tenth of 1 per cent. In 1910 in a very elaborate computation made by Prof. King it was demonstrated that the gross revenue of the country is about $35,000,000,000. It is estimated now by bankers and by economists that for the year 1917 the probable net revenues of our country—by that I mean the earnings of all classes, agriculturists as well as the workmen and the product of capital—will aggregate about $45,000,000,000. I do not mean by that that those are profits. That is the aggregate revenue.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I know that a large sum could be collected in that way, but I am more concerned in having every citizen of the Republic feel his responsibility to the State than I am in just the amount that might be raised under such a law. I tell you that the ordinary citizen who has very little income would be perfectly willing to contribute his part. If he contributed one-tenth of 1 per cent upon his income of $500 a year, he would contribute just as much, in proportion to his means, as the man whose income was $50,000,000 a year, and it binds him just a little closer to his Government. He will be a little more scrupulous in studying its intricacies and understanding its purposes and its principles than though he were treated as of that class who were not able and were therefore not expected to contribute to the expenses of his Government.

Mr. President, I had no thought of taking the floor; but the thought has frequently occurred to me, as I said in the beginning, that, as we take bonds for our foreign loans, we will get back the principal and interest, presumably, upon that part of our expenditures, and they should be utilized to lessen the necessity for a larger American bond issue if it is possible to do it.

Mr. SMOOT addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if it is his expectation to have a vote to-night?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator pleases, I shall be through in just a moment.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire to have the Senator quit. There are Senators here who do not want to remain if there is not to be a vote.

Mr. PENROSE. Why not let us vote now?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to let the Senate vote right now.

Mr. PENROSE. I think the Senator has made a very interesting contribution to the record in this discussion.

Mr. SMOOT. What I want to do, and would do to-night if I had the time—I know that I have not the time—is to go into history, and I wanted to go into Germany and the rest of the countries and show the Senate exactly what those countries are doing. They are in war, and they are conscripting their men, and they are conscripting their wealth the same as I am willing to conscript the wealth of this country. But I want to say to the Senate that no business in the world has ever grown steadily unless it has used its borrowing power for improvements and expansion; and when extraordinary expenses fall upon the Government of the United States there is no reason why she should follow a course different from that followed by all the business interests of all the world.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not desire to take the Senator off the floor, because this is a very interesting discussion, and particularly if he takes up the comparison of wealth between this country and other countries; but I do not propose to have a vote upon this amendment after everybody is gone to-night. The Senate may be assured of that.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, evidently, from what the Senator from Idaho has just stated, there is no desire on the part of some of the Senators to vote upon this amendment to-night. I think what the Senator says is perhaps correct, that a good many Senators are absent.

Mr. BORAH. No; I did not say that, but I say I do not want the consideration of this matter continued until half the Senate is away, and then have a vote. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall finish his speech; but if he will go ahead and finish his speech and say he is going to finish it, we will know what we are going to do.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to finish the speech and then have nobody here to vote upon the amendment. I would very much prefer to have the Senate take a recess now, and I will conclude my remarks to-morrow.

Tuesday, September 4.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the statements that have been made to-day I can not help but believe that Senators will have the wrong impression as to just the proportion of the taxes that we are to raise by bonded indebtedness and by direct taxation. In order to bring the facts before the Senate I am going to take a little time in naming them in detail, so that no one can be mistaken if he but desires to understand the conditions as they really are.

Mr. President, I wish to call attention first to the amount of money that has already been appropriated for the fiscal year 1918, both in the second session of the Sixty-fourth Congress and the first session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. The amount appropriated is $9,124,433,107.11, and included in that amount there is an appropriation of $3,000,000,000 to loan to our allies.

The total appropriations asked for by the estimates that have been given by the Treasury Department up to date amount to $9,891,150,000, and the total already appropriated and more than likely to be appropriated will aggregate the sum of $19,015,583,107.11. In the amount yet to be appropriated is included $4,000,000,000 to be loaned to our allies, making a total loan for the fiscal year to our allies of $7,000,000,000.

Now deduct the $7,000,000,000 that we intend to advance to our allies and it will leave a balance of $12,015,583,107.11.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like at this moment to inject this comment, that if we have to raise $12,000,000,000 for our own expenditures and we will get $2,500,000,000 from this bill, the total amount we will raise from taxation this year will be something over $4,000,000,000, including post-office receipts.

Mr. SMOOT. I will come to that.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be 33 per cent of the total amount of money which we shall spend this year on account of the war, and that is 8 per cent more than any other country in the history of the world ever raised by taxation in one year.

Mr. SMOOT. I thank the Senator for that statement. I have the figures here and was going to take them up in detail and call the attention of the Senate to just what they are.

Mr. WEEKS. I beg pardon of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. When the statement is made here that we are not going to raise over one-seventh of the amount of war expenditures by taxation, that is not the fact; and I shall call the Senate's attention to the figures that disprove it.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be pardoned by the Senator if I take advantage of this interruption to announce, by the request of the chairman of the committee, that he desires that a vote be had this evening on the pending amendment, at such time as may be convenient? I will say that in response to inquiries in the subject by Senators who desire to leave the Chamber.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he has given any attention to or made any examination of the question as to what portion of the expenditures of the Government provided for in these appropriations are in the nature of plant and equipment which will be used and of value for a number of years to come? In other words, it is not exactly accurate, it seems to me, in discussing the question of financing the war or of the development of the various activities provided for by these appropriations to regard all of the appropriations as normal annual war expenditures.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington is perfectly right. I will say now that the regular appropriations made for the fiscal year 1918—and by "regular" I mean appropriations that would have been made if the war had not occurred—amount to $1,962,210,000. All over and above that can truthfully be said to be war expenditures. For instance, Mr. President, for the deficiency in the Military and Naval Establishments of the country alone we have already appropriated $3,281,094,541.60. The general deficiency bill, that is now before the other House, no doubt will carry $4,500,000,000, and nearly every dollar of it is for the Army or for the Navy. Most of that money will be expended for guns, for fortifications, ammunition, ships, and for cantonments, as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] also suggests; but I take the latter to be virtually a loss, because they will be subsequently destroyed. All of the ships, however, if they are not destroyed in battle, the Government will still own; and they are not, as the Senator from Washington suggests, items which will require an annual appropriation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, there are a great number of those expenditures that constitute quite a list of investments that are far more permanent than those the Senator from Utah has mentioned. For instance, there is an appropriation of several million dollars contemplated for the establishment of Government shipyards, which will be a permanent investment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, from the amount I have given—that is, $12,015,583,107.11—there is to be deducted $325,000,000 that the Post Office Department will collect for the fiscal year 1918. Then, in addition to that, there is about $60,000,000 that is estimated by the department and always appropriated for—what is known as the sinking fund. That law as to that fund, however, has been violated from the day it was passed up to the present time. The money is never put into a sinking fund; it has never been taken out of appropriations, and it never will be, notwithstanding the laws upon the statute book to-day. So, Mr. President, in round numbers, what we have already appropriated and what the estimates have asked for, less the loans to our allies and other items that will not be paid from the appropriations made, will amount to about $11,782,371,000. That, of course, does not include the $7,000,000,000 which we are expected to advance to our allies by the end of the fiscal year 1918.

Our receipts from the pending revenue bill, if passed as the committee has reported it, will amount of $2,500,000,000, at least; in fact, I think they will amount to a great deal more than that, taking the industrial earnings of 1917 into consideration.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I suggest that that is as much as England is raising from all sources this year, the third year of the war?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I suggest that England has about one-fourth the wealth which the United States has?

Mr. SMOOT. I think what the Senator from Massachusetts had in view was the expense which England has had to bear in carrying on the war compared with the expense which the United States will be under. What the Senator has said is absolutely correct as to the amount that England is raising. I want to go into that briefly if Senators will permit me, and to show, without a question of doubt, that, based upon the prewar period of England's earnings and America's earnings during those three years, a flat rate in England of 80 per cent is equaled by a flat rate of 46½ per cent in the United States.

Mr. President, I have before me Babson's chart. I suppose all Senators know that Mr. Babson is furnishing and has for years furnished charts showing the comparative gains or losses of the business of every country in the world. He takes a normal line and when business is increased over normal it rises above the line; when it is less than normal it falls below the line.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what really happened during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913—our prewar years and England's prewar years and France's prewar years and Germany's prewar years, with two other years added—and to show the Senate that if we adopt the amendment now offered by the Senate committee the United States will be taxed higher than any other country in the world on her excess or war profits. For instance, England for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, beginning with the month of January, 1913, had a steady increase of business. In only one month of the three years did business fall below normal; in fact, Mr. President, those years were the most prosperous years that England has ever known in her history. On the other hand, in the United States, beginning with November, 1910, business commenced to decline; it fell below the line by March, 1911, and steadily continued to fall until the middle of the year 1912. There was only a period of one month, and that was in the year 1911, when the profits in business exceeded normal, and then they were just above the line by about one-half of 1 per cent.

Then, Mr. President, we find that in January of 1913 the business of this country ran above the normal slightly and in March, 1913, it fell below, and was below the normal up to and including the month of October, 1915, when the war profits began to swell and rise rapidly above normal. The increased activity in industrial lines was then at its height; profits mounted very rapidly, and have been high ever since. We provide a prewar period consisting of the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, and England also provides a prewar embraced within the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, but during the years of the prewar period so fixed in the United States business was below normal, while in England it was above normal.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course the Senator understands, but some of us do not understand, how much below and how much above the line business fell. What was the margin between the two?

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell the Senator in just a moment. I have the figures. Taking the three years, in England the difference would be 7.5 per cent; but the English law gives the corporation the right to take any two years of the three, and under that system the difference would be 8½ per cent; that is, I mean upon the whole business of England. The Senator knows that England only this year has increased the exemption from 7 per cent to 9 per cent, notwithstanding her exceedingly large profits in the prewar years and immediately advanced the rate up to 80 per cent. What was that done for, Mr. President? It was because she gave a larger exemption to business of a normal class, and she wanted to reach the abnormal profits. So she increased the tax to 80 per cent, and taking the earnings of the two countries during the prewar period into consideration the 80 per cent tax imposed by England is equal to a tax of 46½ per cent on business of this country.

Mr. President, what are we doing in this bill? We impose a tax of from 12 to 60 per cent. It is true that the average of all brackets is 31½ per cent, but the larger percentages of increase will fall for the year 1917 within the 60 per cent bracket.

We are imposing this tax upon the business of the country, and yet we have never heard one Senator who has spoken for a high flat rate upon profits mention the fact that we are imposing upon the people of this country, in this bill, an income tax greater than any country in the world imposes on its citizens.

It is too late for me to go into the figures with respect to taxes imposed by Canada, France, Italy, Russia, and Germany, as I have with respect to England, but I will say that in 1910, and during the years 1911 and 1912 and a part of 1913, there was a steady increase in the volume of business in Canada and then it fell off and fell off rapidly in the latter part of 1913, until just before the beginning of the war. It rapidly increased from that time on. Does Canada impose one cent of income tax? No; not one cent. She is in the war; she is fighting for her existence. What tax does Canada impose upon war profits? To-day Canada imposes 25 per cent upon war profits, and not one per cent on incomes. We are imposing taxes upon excess profits from 12 per cent to 60 per cent, and upon incomes from 3 per cent to 67 per cent.

As to France, Mr. President, I find that during those three years, while the percentage of increase in profits and business was not as large as in England, yet there was not one single month during the three years when business and profits did not go above normal. What tax is France imposing upon excess profits? For the first two years of the war she imposed a graduated tax, the maximum of which was 35 per cent. What is her income tax? It begins with less than 1 per cent, and the maximum is 10 per cent, while we are imposing in this bill a maximum of over 67 per cent on incomes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope before the Senator leaves that branch of his subject he will not forget to mention another fact, which also differentiates us from all these countries except Canada, and that is that the American people pay very high State and county taxes, in addition to National taxes, and that in most of the States, in addition to taxes upon property, real and personal, and intangible assets of various sorts, there are income taxes and legacy taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly correct. In some of the States they have both income taxes and inheritance taxes; in most of the States they have an income tax, and in some they only have an inheritance tax but no income tax.

But what would the rural communities of England think if she were taxed the same as some of our Western States are taxed, where 80 per cent of the area of our whole State is tied up by withdrawals, and we have to impose taxes upon the remaining 20 per cent to run all the institutions of the State?

Mr. President, what percentage of our appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 are we going to collect by direct taxation? I know it has been stated to the Senate that it is not over one-seventh of the amount, but, Mr. President, it amounts to 33.4 per cent—8 per cent more than any other country in the world collects to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. That assumes that the taxes secured by this bill for 1917 will be no greater than those secured for 1916, does it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that assumes that we will have $4,000,000,000 of what may be termed "war profits."

Mr. KELLOGG. But that is based upon the earnings of 1916?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator the profits for 1917 will be an increase over the earnings of 1916.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us vote now.

Mr. SMOOT. I am ready to vote now.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, before a motion for a recess is made, I desire to state that in the morning I shall ask the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his amendment temporarily while I offer an amendment which will provide that the Senate shall go on to the old basis of computing the war-profits tax. I think that ought to be decided before we vote on these percentages, because we do not know on what basis we will apply our percentages until the basis is fixed. So in the morning, as I say, I shall ask the Senator if he will be willing to withdraw his amendment temporarily while I offer mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. PENROSE and other Senators. Let us vote.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, the Senator from New Hampshire has asked the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; he said he would do so to-morrow.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us vote on it now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if we are going to vote, I want a quorum here. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hollis	Martin	Shields
Brandagee	James	Nelson	Simmons
Broussard	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Smoot
Dillingham	Kendrick	Penrose	Sterling
Fall	Kenyon	Pittman	Stone
Fernald	King	Poindexter	Trammell
Fletcher	Kirby	Pomerene	Vardaman
France	Knox	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	La Follette	Robinson	Warren
Gerry	Lewis	Saulsbury	Watson
Gronna	Lodge	Shafer	Weeks
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams
Harding	McNary	Sherman	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-four Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate to-night to add anything to the reasons which I have given why this increase should be made in the war-profits tax, but I will ask for the yeas and nays upon this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have already announced that in the morning I should ask the Senator to withdraw his amendment temporarily to enable me to offer an amendment that would dispose of the basis on which these war-profits taxes are to be imposed. If it is agreeable to the Senator, we might vote on this amendment, and then possibly I can get recognition in the morning to offer my amendment. I will ask the Senator if that is agreeable to him?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am entirely willing to withhold the next amendment which I propose to offer until the Senator from New Hampshire offers the amendment to which he has referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement and transfer of pairs as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the previous roll call and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I understand that his position is the same as mine on this matter, and I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I understand that if present he would vote as I do. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]; but I understand, on inquiry, that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is unavoidably absent from the city. If he were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. KENYON. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. WADSWORTH. On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. In his absence I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last roll call and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Borah	Johnson, S. Dak.	La Follette	Trammell
Gronna	Jones, Wash.	McKellar	Vardaman
Hollis	Kenyon	McNary
Husting	King	Norris
Johnson, Cal.	Kirby	Thompson

NAYS—54.

Bankhead	Harding	Owen	Smith, Ga.
Brandagee	James	Page	Smith, Md.
Broussard	Kellogg	Penrose	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Pittman	Smoot
Colt	Knox	Poindexter	Sterling
Curtis	Lewis	Pomerene	Stone
Dillingham	Lodge	Ransdell	Underwood
Fall	McCumber	Robinson	Warren
Fernald	Martin	Saulsbury	Watson
Fletcher	Myers	Shafer	Weeks
France	Nelson	Sheppard	Williams
Frelinghuysen	New	Sherman	Wolcott
Gerry	Newlands	Shields
Hale	Overman	Simmons

NOT VOTING—25.

Ashurst	Goff	Phelan	Tillman
Beckham	Gore	Reed	Townsend
Brady	Hardwick	Smith, Ariz.	Wadsworth
Calder	Hitchcock	Smith, S. C.	Walsh
Culberson	Hughes	Sutherland
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Swanson
Gallinger	McLean	Thomas

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m., Monday, September 3, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 4, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 4, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to have corrected the reference of the bill (S. 2796) to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States. I introduced the bill and I intended to have it go to the Committee on Foreign Relations. By an error it was sent to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that the Committee on Military Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PINK BOLLWORM MENACE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present resolutions of the Texas Farmers' Congress in annual meeting at College Station, Tex., which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS OF THE TEXAS FARMERS' CONGRESS.

COLLEGE STATION, TEX., August 2, 1917.

Whereas the pink bollworm has already created great damage to the cotton crop in the Laguna district of Mexico; and
Whereas this insect has proven itself, wherever it has appeared, to be one of the most damaging insects to cotton that is known; and
Whereas the Federal Government very properly proposes to use every precaution necessary to keep the insect out of Texas, even to the extent of establishing a cotton-free zone on this side of the Rio Grande when that shall become necessary; and
Whereas the establishment of such a zone would deprive a large class of farmers in the lower Rio Grande Valley, who are now growing cotton under dry-land conditions, of their principal money crop and render practically valueless their farms and bring devastation to their homes: Be it therefore

Resolved, It is the sense of the farmers of Texas, assembled in congress at their annual meeting at College Station this the 2d day of August, 1917, that it is incumbent upon our Federal Government to begin now to make some preparation for the possible relief of farmers in the lower Rio Grande Valley by supplying the means for growing other crops as a substitute for cotton. This can only be done by helping the farmers in the district to supply themselves with water from the Rio Grande; be it therefore further

Resolved, That we urge upon our delegation in the United States Congress, and upon our Department of Agriculture at Washington, to lend their interest and influence to the promulgation of a treaty with Mexico at as early a date as possible, in order that our Government may authorize a survey for a dam across the Rio Grande which will supply water by gravity to the delta of the river; be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon our representatives in the State legislature at Austin to take timely cognizance of the menace of the pink bollworm to the Texas cotton industry and through Texas to the cotton industry of the entire South. We therefore ask that the Texas Legislature pass resolutions urging upon our National Congress the importance of consummating a treaty with Mexico at as early a date as possible that will permit of the construction of a dam across the Rio Grande and for the construction of a gravity canal on this side of the river for the supply of the delta.

Adopted.

H. E. SINGLETON,
J. D. LOVEFACE,
FRITZ ENGLEHARD,
Committee.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND OTHER PRODUCTS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I also present resolutions unanimously adopted at the annual meeting of the Farmers' Educational Co-operative Union held in Dallas, Tex., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTIONS UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED AT FARMERS' EDUCATIONAL CO-OPERATIVE UNION, ANNUAL MEETING HELD IN DALLAS, TEX., AUGUST 14-17, 1917.

It shall be our purpose to cooperate with the Federal and State Governments in mobilizing our national resources, organizing our economic forces, and in adjusting industrial affairs of the Nation to a war basis.

To apply in time of peace the economic lessons taught us by the war. To aid in securing reasonable and equitable compensation for services rendered by those engaged in production, manufacturing, and distribution of products.

To bring food, clothing, shelter, fuel, light, and all elementary necessities of life within easy reach of the people by eliminating waste and unnecessary service.

We stand for constructive regulation by Federal Government that will increase efficiency and economy in handling products from producer to consumer. We recommend that Congress bring into action such dormant powers in government as are necessary to put this policy into effect and call upon the business genius of the Nation to administer those powers.

We indorse the food act in its entirety, and pledge our support in the administration of this law. We especially commend guaranteeing profitable prices, regulating articles of trade, and conservation of food and feed products.

We petition Congress to authorize the President to fix a guaranteed minimum price of not less than 30 cents per pound on lint cotton for a period of three years.

We petition Congress to authorize the President to include all articles entering into food, clothing, shelter, fuel, and light within the provisions of the food-control act.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOLLIS. I offer an amendment, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out section 203 of the committee amendment and to insert:

Sec. 203. That for the purposes of this title the amount of war profits shall be determined, except as otherwise in this title provided—

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership or of a citizen or resident of the United States by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; and

(b) In the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or of a nonresident alien individual by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received from sources within the United States during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States during the prewar period.

If the average capital (or in the case of a foreign corporation or partnership or a nonresident alien individual that proportion thereof which the net income of the trade or business from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income) employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period, the war profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the taxable year bears to the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the prewar period.

If a taxpayer fails to present satisfactory evidence as to the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period, the war profits shall be determined as provided in section 204.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gerry	Kellogg	Myers
Bankhead	Grover	Kendrick	Nelson
Brady	Hale	Kenyon	New

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. This announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. NEW. I wish to announce the temporary absence from the Chamber of the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] on official business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] is necessarily absent, owing to illness.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to announce that my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. HUSTING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Last evening I gave notice that I would proceed at this time to finish the remarks that I began upon the bill, but the Senator from New Hampshire has just offered an amendment that I believe ought to be passed upon by the Senate before any other votes are taken. Therefore I gladly at this time yield the notice I gave. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will now proceed with whatever he has to say on this amendment and let us dispose of it, and then I shall conclude what I have to say upon the rates of income and the rates of excess profits imposed under the Senate committee substitute and compare those rates with the rates imposed by the other countries of the world.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Utah for being willing to yield the floor to me at this time. It is very obvious that the Senate ought first to fix the basis on which it will impose the percentage that it finally adopts. For example, we are told that the war profits under the original form of computation will amount to $3,000,000,000, and that under the new method of computation it will amount to $4,000,000,000. Therefore, if we should impose a flat rate of 50 per cent on the original basis, we get a billion and a half in war revenue; if we should impose it on the second basis, we would get two billion. Obviously, those who believe in raising two billion would have to vote for a 50 per cent flat rate on one basis, while if they wanted two billion on the other basis they must vote for a rate of 60 per cent or a little more.

The amendment that I have offered is to the last committee amendment. It merely restores section 203 as it was in the bill as originally reported by the committee. The Senate will find that section on page 15 of the large bill. The one for which it is offered as a substitute is found on page 8 of the last committee amendment, Title II. There is no need to read it. There is no need to discuss its terms. It merely provides that the war profits shall be ascertained by deducting from the current profits the average of the profits of the same company for the three years prior to January 1, 1914.

It makes a difference to me whether we are going to impose a percentage of taxation on a real war-profits basis or on an excess-profits basis. The committee no longer considers this section of the bill a war-profits tax. It frankly calls it an excess war-profits tax. Instead of reckoning a percentage of war profits it reckons its percentage on excess profits.

There is no trouble at all in fixing the percentage and the application of the percentage to the revenue. If we adopt the committee's original plan after we have decided that they are war profits, we will all agree that we ought to take a very large percentage of them. We have merely to compare the return of a corporation for this year with the return of the corporation for the three years preceding the war to get exactly what the war profit is, and then we merely figure the percentage. That is very easy.

Now, if you take it the new way of the committee, you must find out what the capital of the corporation is, because it is a pure exemption allowance based on a percentage of the capital of the corporation.

I need not enlarge before the Senate on the impossibility of finding out just what the capital of any corporation is. That has been argued by all the members of the Finance Committee. It is agreed by every Member of the Senate that it is a hopeless task to undertake to ascertain what the capital stock of a corporation is. It just can not be done satisfactorily.

We started a few years ago, I think five or six years ago, to place a physical valuation on the property of all the railroads in this country. We have been at it for years at an enormous expense, and we have fixed the valuation on three little railroads that none of you ever heard of. They have scarcely made a beginning on the big railroads. Now, if the Interstate Commerce Commission with the money which we placed at their disposal can not fix the valuation of one class of corporations in five or six years, how does the Senate suppose that the Secretary of the Treasury is going to fix the physical valuation of all the corporations in the United States before next July? It is absurdly impossible for any man or any set of men to undertake it. The committee saw that. It was the contribution of this great committee to this great subject to see that these taxes could not be imposed on the basis adopted by the House of Representatives, and I never felt prouder of any committee than I did when this committee reversed the policy of the House of Representatives and brought out a war-profits-tax plan on a sound basis.

Now, just think for a moment. Under the new plan you have simply imposed a graduated income tax on corporations, something never heard of before. Just run your mind back over what we have been doing toward income taxes. The first income tax put on corporations was not an income tax at all, because we had no income-tax amendment to the Constitution. We wanted the corporations to contribute toward running the Government what they fairly ought to contribute, and we levied a 1 per cent or a 2 per cent excise tax, not an income tax at all. Then last spring, when we wanted the corporations to pay still more, we imposed an excess-profits tax, but a flat rate of 8 per cent, with no graduated scheme about it. When this bill came over from the House it imposed 4 per cent on corporations not graduated and an excess-profits tax not graduated. There is the best reason in the world why we should not graduate an income tax on a corporation. It is not only unscientific but it is absolutely unjust and inexpedient. It is easy to demonstrate that.

I am not talking as a friend of corporations. I have an established reputation in my part of the country as an anti-corporation man. I have fought them and they have fought me, and they will fight me just as heartily after this as they did before. But I am looking to the small stockholder in the big corporation. The bigger a corporation is the larger the number of stockholders it has, the more widely diffused are its shares.

Take a corporation that is closely held and is owned by a few men. It is usually immensely profitable but it is not very large; its capital stock is usually very small. Now, see what the effect is. Here is a fairly small corporation, say, with a million dollars capital that is earning a million dollars of profit. Under the computation of the Senate committee, the latest plan, they get a small graduated tax on that corporation, and when the dividends are turned over to the stockholders those wealthy men who own all the stock of this fairly small corporation would have been let off with the lightest percentage in the scale. But take a great corporation like the United States Steel Corporation, whose stock is held all over the country in the hands of a few people, and you impose a great tax on them. You take half their profits and you are taking half the income right out of their smallest stockholders. There is no escape from that. No one will answer, no one will pretend to answer this argument.

Now, why did they do it? This is the reason why they did it. It is perfectly plain. It is because any rate above 50 per cent is considered confiscatory by a great many people in the United States. If you take more than 50 per cent of a man's income you say you are robbing him, but if you can contrive a plan by which you will take 50 per cent out of a corporation's income and then 50 per cent out of the men, you are getting not a hundred per cent, you are getting 75 per cent of the total earnings. You have got 75 per cent out, and then you trust he will not know it and he will not criticize you for taking so much from him. We do it because it is the easiest way, but it is not the right way.

Now, I do not know how this will affect the corporations in my State. I have not figured it. I do not care how it will affect them. We have the biggest textile mills in the country, probably the biggest in the world, the Ameskeag Manufacturing Co.

They cordially despise me and will do everything they can to defeat me again as they did the last time. Take the McElwain Shoe Co., probably the biggest shoe manufactory in the United States and in the world. They have the same attitude. Take the Sullivan Machinery Co., that sends mining machinery all over the world, and so on. These are manufacturing corporations that have been built up under the protectionist theory of this country, and I believe they have been built as they ought on that basis. They are no friends of mine; I am no friend to them. I do not know how this will affect them, but I do want to feel that they have been fairly treated by the Senate, and that we impose this tax on an equitable basis.

I am going to repeat a little what I told the Senate before. If a corporation has war profits, it has something that belongs to the Nation. If they are actually profits made out of our misfortune, we will be justified in going on and taking them all, just allowing them a 10 per cent fee for collecting them. They accumulate them and, as we can get them readily, we ought to go and take them. There is no sense in imposing a graduated tax on profits that belong to us anyway. A man who robs money from your safe might just as well say, "I have only gotten $10,000; do not take it all back; take only 50 per cent." Here is this other fellow who has a million. Take 90 per cent of his. We might just as well say that to a trust fund or of something that has been found on the street: "I found only $10 and you ought to take but 10 per cent of that." Here is another fellow who found $100,000 and we take 90 per cent of his.

If they are war profits, they belong to the people at war, and we ought not to be very tender as to how much we take. That was the committee's old method; that is the sound method. If they were to sit down and face this question to-day afresh and heed their own argument for the past two months, the committee would go back to that plan. This committee know that they can not impose these taxes on the basis they now propose, and they ought not to do it. War profits will amount, they tell us, to $3,000,000,000 this year on the old basis. If we go back to that old basis, and they are really war profits, we ought to take at least 60 per cent of them.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. Smoot] made a very informing address yesterday. He called our attention to many facts that have been overlooked; but I wish to state while the Senator is here that from the very best information I can get Great Britain is imposing a tax this year of $65 per capita. I have seen that stated many times and not disputed. If we impose a $65 per capita tax in this country this year, we shall raise six and a half billion dollars in taxes. The bill as now reported, it is claimed, will produce two and a half billion dollars. Add to that the $1,333,000,000 we raise under existing taxes and we only get about four billion. We ought to get six and a half billion if we proceed according to the British method. Now, so much for the English method.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill will raise two and a half billion dollars from the war-profits tax and income tax alone, and in addition there are various other taxes.

Mr. HOLLIS. The war-profits tax and the income tax are estimated to raise two and a half billion dollars, and the consumption and other taxes three or four hundred million dollars more, as I recall.

So that would make little difference. We are not anywhere near the same basis as Great Britain, if we pass this bill, and we ought to be on a higher basis. That is easy to demonstrate.

For three years we have been making great profit out of the war in Europe; our corporations have been prosperous as never before; everyone has been prosperous. There has been employment and higher wages—though not as high as they should be—and our corporations have been brought up to a position where they are ready to be taxed; they expect to be taxed; and they ought to be taxed, whereas England has gone through three years of grinding war; proud England, that supposed she could finance the world in any undertaking, has had to come to this country and ask for financial help. With a country in that condition paying $65 a head we ought to be ashamed to pass a revenue law that will only call on the people of this country to pay $40 a head. It is not a fair basis.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator from New Hampshire does not want to be interrupted, I would just as lief not disturb him—

Mr. HOLLIS. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted.

Mr. SMOOT. I can answer the Senator in my own time, but I know the Senator wants to be perfectly fair.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will be glad to have the Senator from Utah correct me, if I am wrong.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to call attention to the amount of taxes which have been raised by England every year since the war. Then I will show just exactly what per capita tax they have collected. That is on a basis that there were 50,000,000 in England. I am not taking her colonies into consideration at all.

Mr. HOLLIS. But can the Senator tell me whether it is correct that this year England has imposed taxes amounting to $65 per capita?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not correct, and I want to correct the statement right now.

Mr. HOLLIS. Can the Senator tell me how much the amount is?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator does not want to yield I shall give the figures when I speak.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The amount of taxes collected this year by England will be two billion five hundred and one million and some odd thousand dollars; that is according to the report which they furnish. The estimate is, on the basis of a population of 50,000,000, that there would be, in round numbers, $50 per capita collected in taxation this year.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am glad the Senator made that statement, for it proves my point. They are raising two and a half billion dollars. The population of England is not 50,000,000; it is 42,000,000 and a fraction, which makes the tax practically $65 per head. Those are the figures that I submitted, and I think the proposition is sound.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I wanted to ask the Senator from Utah while he is on his feet if the two and a half billion dollars collected by England included the taxation for the ordinary peace expenses of the Government as well as those of war?

Mr. SMOOT. All the expenses of the Government, I will say to the Senator, are included. I hold in my hand, handed to me by the Senator from North Dakota, a book entitled "The Effect of Wars and Revolutions on Government Securities," by E. Kerr, librarian, and it purports to give the estimated population of Great Britain, her wealth, and so forth, for the dates 1912-1914. According to this book the population of England at the time indicated was 45,663,000. Of course, I can not say exactly the population England has to-day, but I will say to the Senator that the amount which I have given of taxation collected is by Great Britain, not taking into consideration the taxes collected by any of her colonies.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will yield, I desire to say that I have here the World Almanac for 1917, which gives the population of Great Britain, without Ireland, as 41,689,184. The population with Ireland is 46,064,738.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask the Senator—

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do not know whether or not England draws any revenue from Ireland.

Mr. SMOOT. The taxes are imposed upon Ireland the same as they are imposed upon England.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, the population would be 46,064,738.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I thank the Senators, but I shall be sorry to have this matter drift into a discussion of the population of England. There is no doubt England is paying a higher per capita rate this year than we shall pay if this bill is passed in its present shape. The point is that we ought to pay just as much as we can pay, because we have the ability and the wealth to do so. We have not been impoverished; we are right at the apex, at the top of the load. We have more money than has any other nation. In the form of war profits it is gathered in large piles where we can take it easily, and we ought to go and take it and not be too thin-skinned about it.

Now, I want to explain in detail, though not at great length, the difference between the two propositions. I ask to go back to the old plan and ascertain what are war profits as well as we can ascertain them. I know we can not ascertain them exactly; there is no rule that will preserve all the saints and punish all the sinners; but I think the old rule that was imposed by the Senate committee, in the first place, was the best one. That provides for the taking of the profits of a corporation as shown by its return this year; from that is deducted the average of the profits of the same corporation for the three years before the war. In that way we get a rough measure, but a very exact measure, of the war profits. Having ascertained them, we do not take them as income. We have no right to take any income out of a corporation. Some of my friends in New Hampshire will be surprised to hear me say that; but an income tax is not imposed on property; it is not imposed on corporations; an income tax is imposed on individuals in proportion as they enjoy incomes. That is the basis of the income tax. The corporation can not enjoy an income; it can not spend any of it, except to give it to its stockholders; but when you have driven it into the hands of the stockholders, then it is in the hands of people who can enjoy it, and they should be compelled to pay an income tax on the basis of the income they enjoy. The tax may be graduated so that those who get large incomes shall pay a higher percentage than those who get smaller incomes.

The new proposition from the committee is nothing but a graduated income tax on business, exactly the same as the income tax imposed on individuals. It gives an exemption—rather a small exemption—and then it puts a surtax on, just exactly as is done in the case of individual incomes.

Now, assume the case I put to the Senate the other day of a man who has $100,000 capital and goes into business with it. He does not even form a corporation, but does business under the name of John Smith. You tax the income of his business; assume you take 20 per cent of it, and then, as quickly as he gets the earnings in his hands, you tax them again as his private income, so you have taxed the return from that man's business twice. I am talking for the man in business and the partnership in business just as well as I am for the corporation in business.

Some other man with $100,000, instead of putting it into business where it can be taxed as a business and then taxed when it gets into his hands as income, will put it into nontaxable investments. You only tax him once; you do not tax him at all under the surtax, because his money is in tax-exempt securities. The man who goes into business, who employs labor and increases the prosperity of the country gets taxed twice, while the indolent chap, who will not take any risk and help other people to earn a living, gets taxed not at all. That is not right; it is absolutely unscientific, and the committee would not propose it if they did not want to get a large tax without imposing a very large rate on anyone.

Mr. President, I do not think I could put this matter more plainly to the Senate if I occupied the floor for two hours. I am asking the Senate to adopt the language of the Finance Committee in its original bill; I am asking them to go back to the original plan. The Senate ought to decide that and decide it at once. If the Senate decides it will go back to the old plan and tax war profits, I am going to ask the Senate to adopt a high flat rate, because a graduated income tax has no application whatever to war profits. If the Senate insists on clinging to the new plan, the graduated income-tax plan on business—not only as to corporations, but as to partnerships and individuals as well—if the Senate insists on taxing the same invested money twice, then I am going to ask it to impose a flat rate, and if it refuses I am going to offer a graduated tax, so that we will get as much money under this bill as we ought to get. I believe this bill ought to produce altogether $4,000,000,000; I think it can easily be made to do so without doing injustice to anyone. I offer my amendment, and hope it will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. I came into the Chamber while the Senator was speaking, and did not have an opportunity to hear all of his address. I should like to ask the Senator for my own information if the plan contemplated in his amendment is that of taking the three pre-war years and averaging them and then taking this year's profits and deducting one from the other? Is that the basis?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; the original committee plan of deducting the prewar income from the current income and thus getting the war profits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that his amendment ought to be acted upon at this time, so that the Senate may finally decide as to what plan they are going to adopt in imposing taxes under the pending bill.

The committee first reported, as the Senator has said, a plan which would reach only war profits, but I do not think that I am prohibited from giving the Senate information as to what happened in the committee in respect to this question. I will, therefore, say that the action of the committee was not unanimous. After the bill was brought before the Senate and discussed for days—I was going to say weeks—it developed that the plan originally proposed would do an injustice to a great portion of the business of the country. That plan, Mr. President, would allow some of the greatest percentages of profits made by business in this country to escape any excess or war profits tax whatever. If the plan proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is adopted by the Senate, we might as well understand that there are companies in this country making all the way from 300 to 400 per cent per annum which will not pay one cent of excess-profits taxes. We might as well understand that most of the banks of the country will escape excess-profits taxes; that most of the grocery stores, wholesale and retail, will escape any excess-profits tax; that the dry goods institutions, taken as a whole, will escape excess-profits tax; and we must understand also that the automobile companies of the country will not pay excess-profits tax under the pending amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I agree with the Senator's statement. I know that he is a very careful student of the statistics connected with war measures, and I should like to ask him if he is able to tell the Senate what amount of prewar profits would escape this tax? To state it in another way, and perhaps a little more clearly, what amount of profits based upon this prewar rule would escape taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. At least half a billion dollars of taxes would be lost; that is, the Government of the United States would collect by way of taxation under this plan, if adopted, at least a half a billion dollars less than under the substitute now proposed by the committee.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, the loss in taxes would amount to that?

Mr. SMOOT. The loss in taxes would amount to that.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure that that is a low estimate.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that it is a low estimate; but I am positive that it would be that much.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator follow his argument along a little further and give us an explanation or illustration of the manner in which he feels this loss will occur to the Government, if we may have his views upon that subject?

Mr. SMOOT. I will do so now, Mr. President. Take the Ford Automobile Co. The Ford Automobile Co. made in the year 1916 $54,000,000 profit; in the prewar years 1911, 1912, and 1913, its percentage of gain was just as great as it was in 1916, and just as much as the profits of that company will be for the year 1917; but under the plan now advocated by the Senator from New Hampshire, and originally presented to the Senate by the committee, the Ford Automobile Co. would not pay one cent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, since the Senator is discussing this question, I think it would be well enough to explain to the Senate why it was and how it was that the committee originally brought in a plan that would permit all of this vast wealth to escape taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I went into detail on that subject in my speech of the 20th of August, and the action of the committee is just, reasonable, and logical after it learned the condition of the Treasury and of appropriations to be asked for to meet war conditions.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. To either one.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think the Senator from Utah—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can not yield to anyone.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield to the Senator from Alabama or to the Senator from Wisconsin; I do not care which.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I just wanted to ask the Senator if he pretends to say that the committee did not understand when the bill was reported that every company and every class that he has referred to as escaping taxation would escape taxation?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, I say that it was understood and discussed thoroughly in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that there was not a single, solitary meeting of that committee at which I was not present; there was not five minutes' time that that committee was in session that I was not there; and I say now, upon my honor as a Senator, that there never was a word spoken in relation to what effect the plan would have on the banks of the country or the dry goods or grocery establishments, both retail and wholesale, of the country, and no member of the committee or expert knew how the change in plans would affect the revenues. Nobody had it figured out, and the Senator knows that when the question arose I was asked my opinion as to what the difference would amount to, and the expert was also asked, and he said plainly that he did not know; and I expressed an opinion—and it was only a guess—that the amount would be an increase of $300,000,000. Is not that so?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator stated in committee that he thought it would be $300,000,000. It turns out now, according to a computation the certainty of which no man can tell, that it is about $428,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Even more than that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But it is true that the committee well understood that under the bill as reported all classes of business that had as large a profit in the taxable year as they had in the prewar period would pay no tax. That was well understood by everyone.

Mr. SHAFROTH and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of having any misunderstanding in relation to this question as far as the committee is concerned. As I said the other day—

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will not the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as I finish my statement, I will. As I stated the other day, on the estimates made to the committee of the amount of money necessary to be collected for the fiscal year 1918, the committee decided that it was not necessary, under Title II of this bill—the title that is under consideration now—to raise more than $560,000,000; and that being the case, it thought it could well be collected all from war profits, and war profits alone, because the percentage of such profits to collect that amount would not be so great as to interfere or cripple the companies making that class of profits in their productivity and expansion required by the war. But when the new estimates came in, it became evident that there would have to be more money raised, and from additional sources, and it would have been absolutely impossible, if we had raised $1,286,000,000 from war profits alone, for the concerns that have made the war profits to extend their business as required by the demands made upon them on account of the war.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I just want to suggest to the Senator that of course the committee knew, as everybody would know—it is a self-evident proposition—that under the original plan of the committee, if a man or a business was making more before the war than it was making after the war, of course it would not have to pay any tax under this title.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question for information with reference to the Ford profits.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Would the owners of the stock of the Ford company be compelled to pay a tax on those profits?

Mr. SMOOT. Not upon the profits of the company; but when they are distributed as dividends, then they have to pay a tax upon their incomes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, according to this bill, under either system, if there is a tax imposed upon the corporation, and it is deducted, of course, from the income that goes to the stockholder, the stockholder then has to pay in addition to that a tax on the amount of profits which he has received on his stock?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly, Mr. President; he has to pay an income tax. That is what I have been trying to get the Senate to understand, that in this bill we are imposing two exceedingly high tax rates; and before I get through, Mr. President—not at this time, but when I conclude the remarks that I began yesterday—I want to show the Senate what the combined taxation of incomes and war profits or excess profits will amount to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says he has been trying to get the Senate to understand that there are two taxes imposed, the income and the war-profits tax. I apprehend that that has been a matter within the knowledge of all of us from the very beginning. I do not see how there can be any doubt about it. Nobody has ever supposed that you are going to release incomes because you tax war profits, or release war profits because you tax incomes.

Mr. SMOOT. No; and therefore we have to take the two, as I say, to find out what tax we are going to impose upon the business of the United States; but that I am not going to discuss on this amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Then, if I understand the Senator from Utah correctly, the committee, upon the new estimates, decided to invade the so-called normal profits. Am I right?

Mr. SMOOT. That is, normal profit if it is over 10 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Exactly, but the normal profit. Take a concern, for instance, that was making 25 per cent upon its capital; you propose to give it first a deduction of 10 per cent, and then levy your assessment against the excess?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct, with the exception, of course, that we allow each corporation $5,000 exemption.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but the Senator has been asked over and over again why that was not done in the first instance. If I understand the Senator, and I think I do, the reason why it was not done in the first instance was because you were operating upon the plan of getting your money from excess war profits. Am I right?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right, and that is what I have said a number of times here.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator a question. If it would interfere with his argument, and he will answer it later, it will be perfectly satisfactory to me; but I should like to suggest it now.

There are two propositions in the pending amendment, as I understand it. One is the one that the Senator is talking about, and the other is the definition, or there is included in that proposition the definition of the taxable capital.

Mr. SMOOT. If the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is adopted, then there would be no necessity for a definition of capital.

Mr. NORRIS. I came in after the amendment was read; but, as I understand it, it includes that. It strikes that out. I should like to have the Senator before he finishes this discussion, either now or later—if it would interfere with his argument, later—answer the argument made yesterday on the floor of the Senate, and again to-day, that the method of the committee now, the present plan as far as figuring these percentages is concerned, requires of the Secretary of the Treasury practically an impossibility.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe it will be impossible, because the Secretary of the Treasury has already imposed a tax upon the munition plants of this country based upon their capital and surplus.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. As reported by them.

Mr. SMOOT. As reported by them; but under this bill we authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, if upon the face of that return he has doubts as to whether the capital and surplus of the company as reported are inflated, to make an examination into it, and that examination is to be based upon the definition of capital as provided in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point upon which I should like light. I felt rather friendly toward the committee's change, but I was wonderfully impressed with the logic of the argument on the point that I have asked about, made yesterday by the Senator from Wisconsin, and to-day by the Senator from New Hampshire. It seems to me, the way I look at it, that that is the part of the committee's amendment that it is going to be most difficult to meet, if it does, as the Senator said, require an absolute impossibility to find this value within the time when the tax must be levied.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say to the Senator that I have no apprehension whatever on that score, under the definition that has been given, and under the returns that have already been made and taxes collected.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KNOX. I was troubled a little with the same difficulties as the Senator from Nebraska, but this seemed to be a solution of it, to my mind: The greater the capital, of course, the less the tax; and, of course, the temptation will be for the corporations to swell the capital in order to reduce the tax, but they can not say that the capital is any less than they represent it to be; and, as I understand, these calculations that would give $500,000,000 more tax are based upon what the corporations represent the capital to be. Now, the Government will be just so much of a gainer as it can be shown that the capital is more than they represent. In other words, they would be estopped from getting any benefits predicated upon the theory that the capital was greater than represented in their returns.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct, and I want to say now that he is correct for this reason: It is impossible for the corporations of the country to inflate their capital and the Secretary of the Treasury not know it. The companies in the United States have already reported as to what their capital stock and surplus is.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, why is it that we have provided by law for a physical valuation of the railroads of the country, and expended millions of dollars for that purpose, if we are going to take their reports? Does it come down to this—that if the committee's present plan is agreed to, we must accept the report of the corporation itself?

Mr. SMOOT. No; not necessarily, Mr. President; but I will say to the Senator that the estimates that have been made by the committee are estimates based upon the capital stock as the companies report it, and if it proves less we will collect more revenue.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, we have not undertaken to find the present value of their property. We are limiting it to the money paid in.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I should like to proceed for a few moments.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] thought that there was a difference in the taxation of individuals and of corporations. Such is not the case under the bill either as first reported by the committee or as reported now in the way of a substitute. In the present law there is a difference between the corporation and the individual—there is a difference between the corporation and the partnership—but it has amounted to so little, because there is only a normal tax of 2 per cent imposed at present on corporations and not on individuals, and that is not enough difference to cause criticism in the past. But as we place the surtaxes higher and higher, the difference becomes greater, and there must be an equalization made; and this is how it was done.

Under the pending bill there is imposed surtaxes upon all individuals, all partnerships, and all corporations doing business in the country; and we add by this bill a normal tax of 4 per cent on all corporations over and above the 2 per cent normal tax under existing law; and when the dividends are declared by the corporation, the income tax then applies upon whatever amount the individual may receive by way of dividends; and when the individual makes his return the income tax applies to his gains and so as to the partnership. A partnership is no different than an individual, other than that some of them have thousands of individual stockholders. Not only is the individual taxed twice, but every stockholder indirectly through the corporation is taxed twice, and the difference of the normal tax imposed upon the corporation and not on the individual or partnership more than equalizes the tax that the individual or partnership will have to pay. It ought to be equalized, and that is what the committee has undertaken to do.

Now, the Senator thinks there ought to be $4,000,000,000 raised under this bill. Mr. President, there is no one who believes that the appropriations for the fiscal year 1918 exempting the $7,000,000,000 which we expect to advance to our allies will amount to more than $12,000,000,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope that by a fair and reasonable discussion we may get some light, and the questions I ask the Senator are for the purpose of giving light. He refers to the $7,000,000,000 we are to borrow and loan to our allies. Why should that be treated any differently from any other $7,000,000,000 except that we are going to get it back sometime? It is going to be just as hard to borrow it or raise it by taxation as any other $7,000,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the same as an expenditure on the part of the Government as far as raising the money is concerned. Our Government would not be advancing this money to the allies unless it were for the fact that our allies can not borrow the money at less than 5½ to 8 per cent interest, and not only that, the Senator knows, and we all know, that if the Government of the United States did not advance money to some of our allies at this time it would be absolutely impossible for them to proceed with the war as it should be and as it must be if we intend to defeat Germany.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there is nothing benevolent about our loaning that money to the allies. We loan them as much as they spend in this country. It is spent right here. We get the profit and the benefit out of it and we expect to get it back sometime; but I say it is just as hard to raise that $7,000,000,000 as any other $7,000,000,000, no matter what we are going to do with it after we get it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I say to the Senator—

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope the Senator will explain why it is not.

Mr. SMOOT. I will tell why it is not. I want to say to the Senator that for the $7,000,000,000 that is to be raised for our allies our Government will receive bonds from our allied Governments in place of the money advanced them.

Mr. HOLLIS. Right there, is the Senator going to tell us how it is going to be easier to raise the $7,000,000,000? I do not want to get away from that. I am very anxious to know. I want to tell the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SMOOT. In one case the Government makes an investment through the purchase of bonds; in the other case the Government imposes a tax for expenses incurred, with no hope of getting a dollar in return. Our bonds can be sold easier for the first case than the second and at a better rate of interest. English bonds in our Treasury are a basis of credit, but the cost of war will never be returned to the Treasury. It would be easier for the Senator to borrow $1,000 to make an investment in gilt-edge bonds than it would be if the person making him the loan knew that he was to use it to purchase something that would be a complete loss when purchased.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator pardon me? His proposition is this: Our Government borrows $7,000,000,000 in the money market, nearly all of it from our own people. It then borrows $7,000,000,000 in cash here for our allies and takes back from the allies $7,000,000,000 in security. Now, how can the Government borrow money on that $7,000,000,000 of security any better than it can by issuing its own bonds? How is it any better off when it has to go to the same source—the American people—for the money in any event?

Mr. SMOOT. It could not borrow it any easier, but the credit of the United States is good enough to borrow both amounts.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then what good will it do? How will it aid in raising the money?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not finished my answer. I say now that of the $7,000,000,000 we expect every cent to be paid back.

Mr. HOLLIS. After the war?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; after the war.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask the Senator from New Hampshire a question?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from New Hampshire states that every penny that we have loaned the allies has been expended here. Is that true?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I understand we have loaned them as much as to pay for what they have been purchasing in this country. There is no secret about that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Is the amount the same that the allies owe to the American citizen or to American business men?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is my understanding. It has been the policy to loan them enough to cover their expenditures.

Mr. VARDAMAN. To pay what they owe in America?

Mr. HOLLIS. To pay the expenditures they make in this country. That is my understanding.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I did not know that.

Mr. SMOOT. I think what the Senator from New Hampshire states is practically correct. If the loans were not made, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that credits must be provided for balance of trade in our favor with our allies or gold would have to be shipped to this country, and we have so much gold now in the country that I am afraid before the war is over there will be an inflation of our currency based upon it that will increase the price of all products of the country.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SMOOT. And they can not increase the volume of money unless the products of the country increase in price. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am glad the Senator from Utah has announced what I have believed since 1896. But the point I wish to inquire from him is this: The Senator says we have got to lend them this money in order to prevent the gold from being shipped here.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say we had to do it. I say if we did not do it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then it would be prudent for the United States to let the people of Europe pay that gold which they have in settlement of the debts they owe to Americans instead of taxing the American people to furnish the money.

Mr. SMOOT. If the United States was not interested in the outcome of this war, there never would have been a proposition to purchase bonds of foreign countries considered by Congress. We are loaning this money because it is assisting in defeating Germany.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that; but we are lending this money because we believe our allies have not the money with which to pay the debts they owe and the debts they must contract if they would carry on the war.

Mr. SMOOT. They have to raise it in some way.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I understand that; and the United States is loaning it because the allies have not got it.

Mr. SMOOT. Some of the allies are to the limit of their resources, and can not furnish the money required by them to prosecute the war, and the Government of the United States must assist them.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Being allies of the United States, I think it is perfectly proper for the United States to furnish them the sinews of war; but I do not think it is fair to tax the American people to furnish them money when they have money themselves. It is not unfair or out of place for the Senate to give some little thought to the interest of the American taxpayer.

Mr. SMOOT. They pay the rate of interest, of course, that we pay upon our bonds. We are not taxing the people to pay the interest upon the bonds that they sell to us. The law provides that it shall be the same rate of interest that the United States is paying on bonds which it may issue during this war.

The Senator from New Hampshire says there is no benevolence in loaning money to our allies. Yes, there is, Mr. President. I say now that if the United States had not advanced the money to France, if she had not advanced the money she has to Italy, if she had not advanced the money she has already advanced to England, it would have cost those countries at least $200,000,000 more per year for interest upon the amount of money they would have had to borrow upon their own credit.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. New in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator means to say that if they were compelled to go into the money market they would have to pay an additional rate of interest?

Mr. SMOOT. They would.

Mr. BORAH. And that money market is the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the main one at present; that has been acknowledged by everybody. It is true that Japan could advance money and has advanced some money to the allies, and it is true that England could have carried on the war and raised sufficient money from her resources to do so; but we must remember that England has already advanced over $5,000,000,000 to her allies, and of late the United States has been purchasing English bonds to assist her.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I interrupt the Senator to this extent? I hope he will not take the observation of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as being entirely accurate. The United States is not the only money market in the world.

Mr. BORAH. It is a fact, nevertheless, that those people were getting their money in the money market of the United States at the time, and it is a further fact that the first millions of dollars which the Secretary of the Treasury paid over went to paying off certain indebtedness in the money market of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that Germany has not borrowed a solitary dollar from the United States, and Germany has advanced money to her allies; but she is almost on a paper basis to-day. England borrowed very little money in the United States before we began to advance to our allies.

Mr. BORAH. England had borrowed large sums of money here and France had borrowed large sums of money here. This was the great money market in which they were compelled to do business at that time. What other money market would they have?

Mr. SMOOT. Their own money markets.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly; they had their own money market; but evidently it was in such condition that they felt under the necessity of coming here.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question of doubt but if America had not loaned money to England she would have made arrangements to get money to carry on the war, but at a higher rate of interest.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At a higher rate of interest.

Mr. SMOOT. From her own people and her own resources, but would have had to pay a higher rate of interest.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator think that England and France could have gotten from their own people sufficient means to carry on this war without the aid of the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly. England could have taken all the resources of that country, and the Government of France could have taken all the resources of France to carry on the war; but there is a limit of safety in imposing taxes, and France was near that limit.

Mr. BORAH. Why were those countries paying an exorbitant rate of interest if they still had resources at home upon which they could draw?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the money market, like every other commodity, increases and decreases according to the demand for it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I suggest that they were paying the same rate of interest at home that they were paying in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. Every bond that was issued by England carried a definite interest rate, and the bonds sold in England sold at the same price as if sold in the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator permit another interruption? Was it not true when the so-called allied bond issue was floated in this country, 18 months or 2 years ago, not only was it floated at the same average rate of interest as the loan in England was floated, but it was done largely as a matter of convenience in order that the proceeds of the bonds, English and French, sold in this country should be placed on deposit here to be used in the payment of supplies purchased in America? That was the reason for that allied loan. It was not due to scarcity of resources in Europe.

Mr. BORAH. Can the Senator from New York advise the Senator from Idaho as to the amount of gain certain banking firms in New York made out of that transaction?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no figures on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. I have seen the figures several times, and they seemed interesting.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not say as to that, but I say now the Government of the United States has said to our allies, "You shall have money to carry on this war at the same rate of interest we have to pay," and there is not one making any profit on a difference in rate of interest to-day.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator has been interrupted a great deal, but I wish to make the observation that every man who has been a student of finance knows that the bonds of the allies were not selling at par in this country. I think that is well known.

Mr. SMOOT. It is very well known. In fact every newspaper in the United States carried the advertisement stating the bond issue, the rate of interest, and what they were selling for. The Senator is perfectly correct.

Mr. GRONNA. It was not a question of rate of interest. It was a question as to the par value. I know some sold as low as 90 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the very fact that they were below par demonstrated that the rate of interest named in the bond was not sufficient to enable the bond to be sold at par, and, therefore, whatever discount was made upon the bonds was made to bring the rate named in the bond to what the money value was at the time the bonds were sold, just the same as railroad bonds are sold to-day, just the same as other bonds that are sold below par. They are sold below par because of the fact that the risk in the bond that may be taken in purchasing them was not sufficient to make the rate attractive to the purchaser.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask the Senator another question? Am I right in assuming that these bonds were owned by individuals or by corporations? They were not owned by our Government?

Mr. SMOOT. Not a dollar of them.

Mr. GRONNA. Did we permit an exchange of those bonds bought at a discount for bonds issued?

Mr. SMOOT. No. I will say to the Senator we did not, because the only bonds owned by the Government of the United States are bonds that have been issued under the law of April 24, 1917, and carrying the same rate of interest that we ourselves paid for bonds at that time.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not questioning that, but the information I am trying to get is this: We know that some of the financiers of the country bought these bonds very much below par. We know that Morgan & Co. had nearly $3,000,000,000; but this is the question I am asking, because I believe the Senator from Utah knows: It has been charged that the people who bought these bonds at a very large discount made the difference between that discount and par, and that it was a loss to our Government.

Mr. SMOOT. No; such a charge can not be sustained. The only bonds of our allies that the Government of the United States owns are the bonds that the Secretary of the Treasury purchased directly from them, and in the bond itself there is a provision that if at any time the rate of interest upon the Government bonds sold in this country increases from the rate of interest named in the English bonds or the French bonds, the interest of our allies' bonds shall be increased at the same rate and the same amount. So the Senator can see that would not apply to any bond that was sold to any individual or corporation before the passage of the law.

Mr. President, I wish to return to the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire that he thought this bill ought to raise $4,000,000,000. No one, as I said, estimates that there will be more than $12,000,000,000 appropriated for the fiscal year 1918. The Senator would have us impose a tax amounting to 33½ per cent on the total appropriations, all of which is for war purposes, with the exception of $1,900,000,000. Besides the amount to be raised by this bill we are raising under existing law over $1,600,000,000.

And, Senators, let me call attention to the highest proportion of revenue to expenditures during the present war of the principal countries involved in the war. The percentage of money raised by taxes to money raised by bonds in England is 25½ per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. Bonar Law says in his address, which I have before me, that it is twenty-six and a fraction per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. All that I can say is that I take the statement made by the British Government itself as to the estimated amount of appropriations and the amount of estimated receipts from taxes imposed. The figures show the percentage as being 25½; but I will take the figure given by Mr. Bonar Law and say that it is 26 per cent. Granting that it is 26 per cent, we are seeking in this bill to impose 33½ per cent, beside an additional tax of one billion six hundred and odd million dollars—nearly as much as England raised during the second year of the war, and more than she raised during the first year of the war.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Utah made that statement yesterday afternoon in effect. The Senator does not accentuate the fact, however, that England now, after two years of war and experience in war and its effect upon her industries, is raising 26 per cent of her expenditures by taxation. We are only some 7 or 8 per cent above that after enjoying two years of the profits of war, without any of the expenditures of war.

In addition to that, Mr. President, England has a national wealth of only about $85,000,000,000, while we have a national wealth of $250,000,000,000. Now, is it especially enlightening, under such circumstances, to compare 26 per cent and 33 per cent, when England has already taken 50 per cent in a previous year and 60 per cent in a previous year of those same profits?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho can not defend the position which he has just taken. To-day, with 80 per cent taxes imposed upon war profits—and I wish the Senators would do me the honor to listen when I speak upon this question and endeavor to show the difference between the taxes under the prewar period rule in England and those under the prewar period rule on the business of the United States—with all that, her proportion of revenue raised by taxes to expenditures amounts to only 26 per cent, while ours is over 33 per cent. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has just made the statement that this bill ought to carry $4,000,000,000, which would be more than 33½ per cent, not taking into consideration the revenue to be collected under existing law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. The Senator refers to the amount of wealth of the United States as compared to the wealth of England. There is no reason why that should be taken into consideration. It is the amount of the expenditures and the cost of the war which is to be taken into consideration. Everything that we buy costs us more; we pay our soldiers more; we are appropriating more money than England or any other country in the world. We were totally unprepared for war, and these large appropriations being made are for preparation for war, a large part of which should have been made years ago.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho last night referred to the proportion of revenue to expenditures in this country during the Civil War. The highest percentage of taxes to expenditures during the Civil War was 20.42 per cent, and that at a time when our bonds were being hawked at a discount from one end of the country to the other and in all parts of the world. If we were selling our bonds to-day at 80 cents on the dollar, there might be some excuse for Senators saying we should not issue bonds; but when we pass this bill, even if it passes in the form of the substitute amendment offered by the committee, the rate per cent of taxes to the expenditures of the Government will be higher than that of any other country in the world.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator mean in the world at the present time?

Mr. SMOOT. I mean in the world at the present time; and I think that the proportion of our taxes to our expenditures in this war—although I have not looked closely into the question—is as great as, if not greater than, in any other war that has ever taken place.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah a question with reference to the amount which we are proposing to raise by income taxes—taxes on individual incomes—according to this bill, if it is passed as the Senator indorses it, and the amount that will be raised by reason of the war-profits tax. What will the two combined amount to?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean the average?

Mr. BORAH. No; I mean the sum total which we shall raise from the income tax and from the war-profits tax.

Mr. SMOOT. From the income tax the amount will be $834,000,000 as the bill is now reported.

Mr. BORAH. England, after being two years in war, is raising a billion dollars this year by income taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but she is raising from all taxes only $2,501,000,000.

Mr. BORAH. She is raising from the war-profits tax a billion dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is upon the basis of the prewar years of 1911, 1912, and 1913—

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. The most prosperous years of her history.

Mr. BORAH. That has absolutely nothing in the world to do with the proposition that a country of about 46,000,000 population after two years of war is raising a billion dollars tax on incomes and a billion dollars on war profits.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to proceed. The percentage of money raised by taxation to the money raised by bonds in France is 14½ per cent. In France the income tax imposed begins at 1 per cent and gradually increases to 10 per cent—not over an average of 5 per cent, while we are imposing an income tax in this bill from 6 to 62½ per cent, or an average of 48 per cent, as against 5 per cent in France.

In Germany the ratio of revenues derived by taxes to those from bonds is 14½ per cent; in Canada 8 per cent—not one-quarter of what the Senator from New Hampshire wants to raise by this bill alone.

Mr. HOLLIS. When I said $4,000,000,000 I meant all taxation. I think this bill should raise $3,000,000,000, and that there should be raised $4,000,000,000 altogether by taxation.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, if this bill raises $3,000,000,000, we shall raise altogether $4,630,000,000.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is it exactly, and if I said that we should raise $4,000,000,000 under this bill—

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator from New Hampshire said.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is not what I meant.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will say that that is what the Senator did say.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am willing to admit that I said any foolish thing in the world but I want to set it right.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing to admit that the Senator meant only $3,000,000,000, Mr. President. Then I will have to go to work and make my figures over again and while they will not be so striking, yet a wide difference will be disclosed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to put into the Record at this point in the speech of the Senator from Utah, while he is discussing the various income taxes of different countries, the income-tax provision for 1917 that is now pending in the parliament of Canada. It is as follows:

4. (1) There shall be assessed, levied, and paid, upon the income during the preceding year of every individual residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada, the following taxes:

(a) Four per cent upon all income exceeding $2,000 in the case of unmarried men and widowers without dependent children, and exceeding $3,000 in the case of all other persons, 30 and in addition thereto.

(b) Two per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $10,000; and

(c) Five per cent upon the amount by which the income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $20,000; and

(d) Eight per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $30,000; and

(e) Ten per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $50,000; and

(f) Fifteen per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $100,000; and

(g) Twenty-five per cent of the amount by which the income exceeds $100,000.

And there it stops.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I have understood the senior Senator from Utah to state upon a number of occasions that the revenue derived from present tax laws is about $1,067,000,000. I notice that the report of the Finance Committee accompanying the bill which is now before the Senate states that existing tax laws yield approximately $1,354,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. One billion three hundred and thirty-three million dollars, without taking into consideration the $325,000,000 which we collect through postal charges.

Mr. KING. I was about to ask the Senator whether the discrepancy arose from the failure to include the amount of postal revenues collected?

Mr. SMOOT. That accounts for the difference, I will say to the Senator. The plan followed ever since I have been in Congress is to include in what are called the general appropriation bills the appropriations for the Post Office Department. The appropriations for the Post Office Department generally amount to about the revenue received by the department. Then, under the existing law, we estimate the amount to be collected from all sources, with the exception of the Post Office, which is always reported separately. That is the reason for the seeming discrepancy, I will say to my colleague.

I will say further that under the present law it is required that 1 per cent of all the receipts at all of the customhouses of the United States shall be set apart as a sinking fund; but, as I stated last night, that law has never been adhered to by any administration from the day of its passage to the present time. However, the amount of $62,000,000 is estimated for that purpose.

Now, Mr. President, going back, I desire to repeat that the percentage of revenue derived by taxation and that raised by bonds in England is 26; in France, 14½; in Germany, 14½; in Canada, 8; and in the United States, under the substitute offered by the Senate committee, 33½ per cent.

Take the percentage of income tax in England, France, and Germany as compared with the income tax of the United States, and what do we find? In England the percentage is from 11½ to 42½ per cent, on a graduated scale; in France it is from 1 to 10 per cent, on a graduated scale; as to Germany it is impossible for me to tell what the average is, for under the German law there are at least two or three hundred brackets; but Germany starts with 0.57 per cent.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate now to call attention to the exemptions of all these countries. We think we have exemptions in this country, but we do not know the first principles of them as compared with the manner in which the exemptions are worked out in France, Germany, and even in England.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is a well-recognized fact also that in Germany everyone pays an income tax. The burden falls upon all German citizens, as it ought to fall on all American citizens.

Mr. SMOOT. The income tax in Germany falls on all incomes over and above $214.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That embraces practically the entire country.

Mr. SMOOT. In Canada the percentage of tax on incomes is nothing; in the United States under this bill it is 48 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, after the Senator gets through with the percentages, we still do not raise as much taxes in this country from incomes and profits as they do in England.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I fear that I can not explain myself in a way that the Senator can understand. I have stated the reason, however, time and time again.

The question before the Senate is this: Shall we go back and adopt the plan originally reported to the Senate, or, in other words, impose this tax upon war profits alone and allow billions of dollars in excess profits running from 10 per cent up to 1,000 per cent per annum escape taxation? I do not believe the Senate is going to do that, but if that is what the Senate wants then they should vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. If they think that these swollen profits made in the past, profits that are not counted by tens of per cent but are counted by hundreds of per cent, should bear a portion of war expenses, they will vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WARREN, Mr. JOHNSON of California, and Mr. SMITH of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah a question regarding another phase of the subject in connection with this amendment. It seems to be a weakness, and the same weakness was contained in the original bill. I refer to corporations which were unfortunate enough to make nothing, or nothing of consequence, during the three prewar years. Under the amendment offered later on by the committee there is a minimum established of 6 per cent, and surely that is low enough. There are corporations that have suffered by fires and explosions and by the elements—

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And by floods.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; and by floods—that made nothing, or even lost money, during the three prewar years. Are we going so to provide that such corporations as that shall be seized by the neck and their entire profits taken from them because, perchance, during the three prewar years they made nothing? That that would happen under the original bill to me is perfectly plain, and I think it is equally true that it would happen under the amendment. It is true that in the original bill it was provided that there might be an exemption in such cases of the average profits of concerns engaged in like business; but imagine a corporation which has met with misfortunes and made no money during those particular years when making up their returns going to their competitors and asking how much they made in a given time, and then ascertaining an average.

Mr. SMOOT. They do not go to competitors, I will say to the Senator; they go to the Treasury Department. They will find the desired information there from the reports that have been submitted in the past.

Mr. WARREN. On the other hand, how much worse is that? They are to make up their reports from their own books. Shall the taxpayers from all the remote precincts of this country go down to the Treasury Department and ask them how they shall make their annual returns? It seems to me that it is a very valuable change, one that ought to recommend itself to every Senator—the one offered in the committee amendment where the taxpayer may claim an exemption of 6 per cent as the minimum. In this way some protection, plain and open, is afforded to those who were unfortunate enough not to make a profit amounting to 6 per cent. This minimum can obtain without the confusion and uncertainties of the other plan.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the bill takes care of all such cases. It was amended for that purpose, and I think there is no question but that any unfortunate concern, no matter what the cause of the misfortune during the prewar period made no profit, or made a profit less than 6 per cent, has a perfect right to take the average profit of like businesses. I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that that is very easily arrived at, because all those businesses have been required to make annual reports ever since the year 1909, and they are on file, and we can find what the average is by writing a letter at any time to the Treasury Department. They will tell you. If the average profit of like businesses were 20 per cent, then the man conducting the business would be allowed 10 per cent. If the average of like businesses were 9 per cent, he would be allowed 9 per cent exemption; but in no case would it be less than 6 per cent if all of the like businesses in the United States averaged but 6 per cent.

Mr. WARREN. That is true under the amendment of the committee; but I say that under the original bill, which now is sought to be reintroduced by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], that matter is left open.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, the Senator is right about that.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire should not prevail because of that particular alone.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator to say that it was in the original committee amendment and also in the substitute.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator meant that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire—

Mr. WARREN. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire undertakes what the first bill did.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is right.

Mr. WARREN. And it ought not to prevail.

Mr. SMOOT. That is right.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may be permitted to put it in another way, if a corporation has been very successful during the three prewar years and very successful during the current year it shall escape; but if it was unsuccessful during the three prewar years and successful this year it shall be penalized by the Government because it was unsuccessful during those three years.

Mr. WARREN. That is it exactly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. A great deal has been said about the payment of the so-called excess-profits tax. This will require a very large sum of ready money. Is the Senator quite sure that this money is available?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will remember, I referred to that very thing in my speech last Friday, and I am going now to say to the Senator that I am going to try to have this amendment adopted: Strike out section 1009 and insert:

SEC. 1009. That all internal-revenue taxpayers who are required by law to render returns shall pay, without prior levy, assessment, or notice, and at the same time as the return is required to be made, one-quarter of the tax, and shall pay the balance in three monthly installments of equal amount, and provision of law fixing any other time as the time when such tax is due to the contrary notwithstanding. All penalties provided by existing law for failure to render return and pay tax when due are hereby made applicable to any failure to pay the tax at the times required in this section.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to commend the purpose of the Senator from Utah, who is always practical and far-seeing. I think it is a fallacy to imagine that the excess profits are now in the hands of the corporations that have earned them. I know a case where a corporation which earned large excess war profits is going out of business because it can not find the money with which to pay these proposed Government assessments.

Mr. SMOOT. There are four of them in Minnesota that I know of.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I see that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] smiles at that suggestion. I suppose he has some good reason for doing so, but I have heard of a case exactly in point.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I was smiling because the thought of the Senator from Michigan suggested to me the predicament in which a farmer in Ohio found himself some time ago. Though he had one of the largest and most productive farms in the country, he complained that he had nothing to eat; and he had nothing to eat because prices were so high that he sold everything and did not leave anything for his family.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. In the case of the corporation to which I have referred, their earnings were passed out into betterments and improvements and have not yet brought a return, and yet these earnings will constitute a direct lien by the Government of the United States. I think some provision ought to be made—and I am glad the Senator from Utah has anticipated it—which would give them time to find the money to pay this tremendous tax which the Government levies.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just one more word and I shall be through.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah ought to permit me to answer the criticism of the Senator from Wyoming. It was addressed to the Senator from Utah, but it was directed at me. There is a perfect answer, and I should like to give it, so that it may follow what the Senator said.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Wyoming is a perfectly fair, perfectly honest, perfectly well-intentioned Senator; but he has not been here, so it is not strange that he does not know what is in the bill.

My amendment does not cut out that portion of the bill which provides that if a man is unfortunate, and makes less than other people engaged in the same business, he may be allowed an exemption. As the Senator from Utah says, he may claim the exemption, and the Treasury Department have all the returns, and they can figure it for him easily. That is in section 205 of the committee amendment, which I do not ask to have stricken out.

Mr. WARREN. I have read the bill and I have read the debate; and I will say to the Senator that he does not cover the point that has been covered by the committee itself in its later amendment to the original bill, in which there are established stated minimums, which said minimums the Senator from New Hampshire now seeks to reject.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is the whole point of the bill, that you can not get an established minimum, and that is why I offer my amendment; but it does not overlook the point to which the Senator has called attention.

Mr. WARREN. It overlooks it in the sense that it leaves him, as I say, to go to his neighbors or to go to the department to find out what exemption he will be allowed rather than to go to the law itself, which provides that it shall not be below 6 per cent.

Mr. HOLLIS. There again the Senator shows that he does not understand the bill, because in order to get 6 per cent he has got to apply to the Treasury Department to find out what his capital is and—

Mr. WARREN. Nothing of the kind, with all respect to the Senator.

Mr. HOLLIS. He certainly has. He can not get it at any other place.

Mr. WARREN. The corporation makes out its returns in its own office. It makes them out from its books, and if nothing has been made in those three years under the committee amendment it simply can state that it claims the minimum of 6 per cent. The corporation can not do that under the Senator's amendment or under the original bill, except through going out and finding what other corporations have made and taking their average.

Mr. HOLLIS. I hope the Senator does not think that if a corporation makes a return of that kind to the Secretary of the Treasury, and says it did not make 6 per cent, the Secretary of the Treasury is going to believe it. The Secretary has got to investigate that matter and find out whether it is so or not, and that involves finding out what the capital of the corporation is. It is the Treasury Department that is going to find out what the capital is and fix the 6 per cent; not the corporation that makes the return.

Mr. WARREN. The corporation is going to find out afterwards from the Treasury Department if its return is questioned, but not before. Let me say to the Senator, with all respect to his observations, that I have been away and may not, in his estimation, understand the bill; but I have made out a good many reports; I know how the Treasury Department treats them; I know how corporations act under the law; and I do not need the instruction of the Senator from New Hampshire concerning that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. Before he resumes his seat will he be kind enough to explain to the Senate upon what theory the committee proceeded to determine that one man or one class of business should be entitled to an exemption of 6 per cent, and that another class, perhaps engaged in the same business, should be entitled to 10 per cent? In other words, I hope the Senator can explain—doubtless he can—whether the committee regarded that as a fair, equitable distribution of taxation and the burdens that are laid upon the taxpayer.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly I can explain it. The committee took the position that there are businesses in the United States that are perfectly safe whose profits hardly ever amount to more than between 6 and 8 per cent, and such companies should not be entitled to an exemption of more than the amount of their usual, normal profits. Now, if that class of businesses as a whole make 6 per cent, they ought to be entitled to 6 per cent and no more. If they make as a whole 7 per cent, they ought to be entitled to 7 per cent; but for exemption purposes we say that there is not a class of business in the United States but that ought to have 6 per cent exemption. That is the minimum exemption.

Mr. President, there are other businesses in the United States that are risky in their nature, that will not be undertaken by individuals forming corporations unless there is a higher profit possible. For instance, take the mining business of the country:

When a mine pays a dividend, if it is 10 per cent, it is not because the working of the mine has developed a profit. That mine is not paying profits; it is paying out of its capital, because just as soon as the ore is taken out the mine is worthless. It is a self-consuming corporation, and every dollar that is taken out never can be replaced by any power in this world. The Senator from Alabama knows that mines hardly ever live, particularly metal mines, and produce profitably for more than 10 years. The committee thought that companies of that kind should be at least allowed an exemption that during the 10 years would more than likely take all of the product from the mine and put it into circulation if it were money or into commerce if it were other metals.

Mr. President, I will admit that, as far as I was concerned, I thought it ought to be 6 to 12 per cent, but a majority of the committee decided upon 10 per cent. I think no one can find fault with the difference between 6 and 10 per cent allowed as exemptions, taking into consideration the different risks run in different classes of business with which we are all familiar in the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, the amendment that has been presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] is one, of course, as has been repeatedly stated, that is brought to us by the committee itself. I do not desire to discuss the matter; but in view of the very eloquent and the very forceful argument that has been made by the Senator from Utah against this amendment and in favor of the particular mode now advocated by the committee, I desire to read into the RECORD, so that it may be in juxtaposition with this eloquent and forceful argument, what the Senator from Utah and his colleagues said concerning the very mode that now he advocates when they presented to this body the report of the Finance Committee; and so I read:

The fundamental difficulty in assessing a tax on these lines—

These were the House lines, and the lines now adopted by the Senator from Utah—arises from the difficulty of establishing a standard or measure of the amount of actual capital invested. The House bill endeavors to overcome this difficulty by a proviso designed to prevent inflated valuation of good will and the like intangible assets. To be reckoned as actual capital, the House bill requires that their value must be established or accredited through their being paid for "in cash." But provisions of this kind, designed to prevent inflation of capitalization are usually of little real effect. Indeed, it is doubtful whether they can in any way be framed so as to be effective. Payments for good will and other intangible assets can easily be made to appear on the books of a corporation to have been made in cash. Almost always they are made so to appear. This familiar way of watering the stocks of corporations is impossible to detect and counteract without a specific examination of the precise facts in each case. Such an examination, if made for all concerns of every size and kind, as the House bill contemplates, must necessarily extend over a long period of time; it must be made in an enormous number of cases; it must lead to dispute and contest, and must be productive of unlimited litigation.

Lest we forget, I present the report of the majority of the Finance Committee, one of whom was the distinguished Senator from Utah, upon the particular mode that now he advocates.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to ask the Senator from Utah a question before I vote upon the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. In the original bill I find, on page 14, deduction is made based upon the prewar capital, but in the amendment as reported from the committee this language is used:

(a) In the case of a domestic corporation or partnership of a citizen or resident of the United States by deducting from the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year the average amount of the annual net income of the trade or business during the prewar period; but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 or more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year.

So that the Senator may understand the question I asked, suppose I was in business three years ago and had a capital and a surplus of $150,000, we will say, and I have made $25,000 more, which I passed to the surplus during the three years, under the amendment I would be allowed to add to my capital stock the surplus which I had not distributed.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that would be held as undivided profits.

Mr. GRONNA. As profits?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. Would not that materially reduce the amount of taxes that we would collect in the whole country?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because we know just what increase has been made in the surplus and undivided profits of all the companies of the United States as a whole, and it is based upon the increases that have been made since the prewar period.

Mr. GRONNA. For illustration, suppose I employ the same amount of capital this year, but I decide not to distribute any dividends at all, although I made huge profits, would it not be possible for me to escape taxation entirely under the language of the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it would not.

Mr. GRONNA. Why would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. First, under the bill, there would be a 6 per cent tax imposed upon whatever profits you made. That is called the normal tax. Then again there is a provision in the bill that if the profits are not distributed there shall be imposed upon that undistributed portion of the profits a tax of 10 per cent.

Mr. GRONNA. I understand, but suppose I make $150,000 profit and pass it to the surplus?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be taxed just the same under the bill.

Mr. GRONNA. It could not go above 10 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. In all cases, if the Secretary of the Treasury has reason to believe that it was withheld for the purpose of escaping taxation, it would be taxed 15 per cent over and above the 6 per cent normal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And taxed as if it had been distributed?

Mr. SMOOT. And taxed as if it had been distributed, as the Senator from Mississippi suggests. Not only would it be taxed 15 per cent, but it would be taxed as if it had been distributed to the stockholders or to the individuals or partnerships, as the case may be.

Mr. GRONNA. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Harding	McKellar	Shields
Borah	Hollis	McNary	Simmons
Brady	Husting	Martin	Smith, Md.
Brandeggee	James	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	New	Smoot
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Norris	Sterling
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Stone
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Page	Trammell
Dillingham	Kellogg	Penrose	Vardaman
Fall	Kendrick	Phelan	Wadsworth
Fernald	Kenyon	Polindexter	Warren
Fletcher	King	Pomerene	Watson
France	Kirby	Ransdell	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Saulsbury	Williams
Gerry	Lewis	Shafroth	Wolcott
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard
Hale	McCumber	Sherman

Mr. STONE. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. REED] is temporarily absent from the city on very important business. His absence is unavoidable. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and to state that he is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. Both Senators are absent on account of illness. I ask that this may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. HUSTING. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is unavoidably absent and that he is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I will let this stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAMES (when Mr. BECKHAM's name was called). I wish again to announce that my colleague [Mr. BECKHAM] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I understand that he would vote as I shall on this question, and therefore being at liberty to vote I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I do and I shall therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). My pair, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], is unavoidably absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE]. I am informed, however, that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] would vote as I vote. I therefore transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Kentucky and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], who, I am informed, would vote as I do on this question. Therefore I vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 57, as follows:

YEAS—12.

Borah	Gronna	Jones, Wash.	La Follette
Brady	Hollis	Kenyon	Myers

So Mr. HOLLIS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senate has now adopted the second plan proposed by the committee, which is a graduated income tax on business with a minimum exemption of 6 per cent on the capital invested. If no Senator cares to offer an amendment for a flat rate, I intend to offer an amendment for a 50 per cent flat rate on this income tax on business.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to get the idea of the Senator from New Hampshire. I had intended to offer an amendment for 62 per cent based upon the war-profits plan of the committee as first proposed. Now that that plan has been rejected by the Senate I am not inclined, of course, to offer that amendment. I think the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had an amendment to offer on the basis of 60 per cent, but I do not know what his plan may now be.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Wisconsin was in the Chamber when I stated my proposition, I think. He is in the Chamber now. If he desires to offer an amendment at a higher rate, I will withhold mine.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment reported by the committee striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and inserting after the parenthesis, in line 13, page 12, the words "60 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MYERS. I should like to ask the Senator from Wisconsin what per cent of taxation this amendment provides?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Sixty per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a flat rate of 60 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask to have the amendment read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Amend by striking out all of page 12 after the parenthesis in line 13, all of page 13 down to and including line 22, and insert after the parenthesis, in line 13, page 12, the words "60 per cent upon war profits (determined as hereinafter provided)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee. The yeas and nays having been ordered, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as on the preceding vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before and vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. HARDWICK's name was called). The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is absent, attending the meeting of the National Bar Association. He requested me to state that he would support this amendment if present. He also requested me to state that he would have voted, had he been present, for the amendments which I have previously offered. I neglected to do so at that time and make the statement now.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair as before and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KENYON. I rise to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS]. Were he present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HARDING. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has not voted. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I would, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] upon official business. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND].

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent because of illness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Borah	Johnson, Cal.	La Follette	Thompson
Brady	Jones, Wash.	McKellar	Trammell
Gronna	Kenyon	McNary	Vardaman

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOLLIS. I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of section 201 and insert:

SEC. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing law and under this act there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the income of every corporation, partnership, or individual a tax (hereinafter in this title referred to as the tax) equal to 50 per cent of the war profits determined as hereinafter provided.

For the purposes of this title all the trades and businesses in which a corporation or partnership is engaged shall be deemed to be a single trade or business, and all its income from whatever source derived shall be deemed to be received from such trade or business.

This title shall apply to all trades or businesses of whatever description (whether continuously carried on or not), including the business of rendering any services for a commission or of acting as an agent of any description, except—

(a) An office or employment, including that of a commercial traveler or agent whose remuneration consists wholly of a fixed and definite sum, irrespective of the amount of business done or any other contingency; and

(b) A profession the profits of which depend mainly on the personal qualifications of the individuals by whom such profession is carried on and in which there is not required the investment of more than a nominal capital.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment is to impose a flat rate of 50 per cent on war profits as ascertained under the second committee plan. The Senate has now voted to adopt the second committee plan. This is the only source of taxation that we are intending to impose that may be called war profits. This is the only place where we distinguish between an ordinary income and an income that may be ascribed in part, at least, to the war.

The English rate in the first year of the war was 50 per cent on war profits. It would seem after three years of war profits, when we have not suffered at all and have not spent anything for the war, we might at least start where England started when the war broke out. For that reason I offer this flat rate of 50 per cent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] because I believe it would prevent any development by reason of the flat rate which it seeks to impose. Suppose it is desired to enter upon a new enterprise. Is it possible that men are going to risk their money when they know they will have to pay one-half of the profits over the exemption to the Government? Will they not realize the fact that they had better not enter upon an undertaking when, if successful, they will be required to pay to the Government one-half of their profits, but in the event of failure and loss they will get nothing whatever from the Government? In other words, it seems to me that the imposition of the flat rate proposed will have a tendency to prevent the creation of new enterprises in the United States. Some new undertakings are absolutely essential in order to properly prosecute the war. Copper, zinc, lead, phosphate, potassium, sodium, coal, and oil are some of the greatly needed products, and increasing quantities must be found and mined.

In the mining industry, for instance, where enterprises are undertaken at first in a limited way, it can readily be seen that people are not going to enter upon them if they will have to pay to the Government one-half their profits, and in the event they should fail the money invested will be a total loss to them. It is hard enough to get them to mine, even when they have no tax to pay.

I believe, Mr. President, that the system which is presented by the Committee on Finance is the better system. Where the enterprise is small, as all new businesses are, the amount which is proposed to be levied as a tax is small, and as the corporation becomes more powerful, as it becomes greater, it is made to bear a heavier burden, and it can then afford to bear a heavier burden. That is the system adopted as to individual incomes. Why should it not be adopted as to the incomes of corporations?

We can not conduct a war of any great duration and magnitude unless new development is going on, and we are not going to have any development in the way of new enterprises in the event that we make a flat levy of 50 per cent upon all the profits that shall be made.

Particularly is that true as to the development of many enterprises upon the public domain of the United States. Who would think of entering into a mining company, expecting and knowing that it must pay to the Government one-half its profits, if it makes a profit, and yet at the same time if it loses that it must lose all? There is a chance of three to one against a man under those circumstances. The man who ventures the investment of money in mining even when there is no tax takes a great hazard of making anything. More than half fail. Consequently, when men desiring to form a corporation realize that it will be taxed 50 per cent on its profits, you can readily see that they are not going to proceed with the enterprise. Such a policy is going to prevent development; it is going to produce a condition of affairs which will result in stagnation, particularly in the West.

For that reason, it seems to me, Mr. President, we ought to consider very carefully whether we should proceed by the imposition of a flat rate in taxation or whether we should adopt the policy which has been reported by the committee of starting at a low rate for the companies which are making a small profit and which have small capital, and graduating the tax until it gets to 60 per cent, which is the highest amount recommended in the report of the Committee on Finance. It would be far better, in my judgment, to tax to the extent of 70 per cent on the established corporations making enormous profits than to impose a flat rate of much less percentage on the small enterprises and those which might be undertaken. It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we want to develop new enterprises we ought not to impose this large tax on all profits, whether small or great; but that if we want enterprises to continue during this war, if we want enterprises to be undertaken by men of limited means, we shall of necessity have to provide a graduated tax to be imposed upon such companies.

For the reasons given, Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire will be voted down.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I have heretofore taken no time in this debate, and now desire for a few minutes to express my views in a general way.

We have had so much discussion about the various amendments that I think there is considerable confusion in the minds of most Senators concerning just what this bill will do. I do not profess to be able to clear that up. I have voted for the higher rates of taxation on large profits—I will not say "swollen" profits, because that term is quite offensive to some Senators, but large profits—and shall continue so to do.

Mr. President, before the convention in Baltimore in 1912 were the names of some of the strongest men and ablest men in the Democratic Party, some of whom received a large number of votes and others a lesser number for the nomination for the great office of President of the United States. Among that number was a leader of the Democratic Party in the other House—a great, brainy, clear-headed American citizen, a specialist along financial lines and with great experience in the formation of revenue measures. Since that time he has been elected to this body from the State of Alabama. In that convention at Baltimore, as I remember, he commanded over 100 votes on all of the ballots until the break, and at one time had 180 votes. He is one of the most honored Members of this body and one of the most honored citizens of the Republic. No conversation, no article concerning the possibilities of future nominations to the Presidency is complete without the mention of the name of Senator UNDERWOOD. That Senator said on the floor concerning this bill things that must challenge the attention of the Senate. If not, they certainly will challenge the attention of the country. I quote him, because I will not say the things that he said about this bill. In his speech of August 30 he said:

If the provisions of this bill as presented by the committee are not filled with twilight zones and dark places that are not ascertainable and not understandable, then I have never seen a bill reported to the Congress of the United States that was in that category.

And he further remarked that the financial philosophy of this bill would work out the situation that "to him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath." That is the statement that goes to the country from one of the greatest leaders in the Democratic Party to-day, and one of the ablest and clearest-headed men in this body. Such a statement may not challenge the attention of the Senate very markedly; the Senate gets the notion that it is a pretty supreme body; but statements like that ought to challenge our attention, and they will challenge the attention of the great masses of the people of this country. It is a most remarkable statement coming from such high authority.

Mr. President, I say very frankly that I am not an expert on these financial questions, and I am not going to criticize the Committee on Finance at all. I have the greatest respect for the honored chairman of that committee. I believe him to be one of the squarest men in public life. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], who is a perfect compendium of all knowledge upon financial questions, in his opinions on these questions is entitled to the greatest respect. I know the hard work that the committee has done, thankless in a way, of course; but I think they can hardly blame Senators, when they change their minds about the plan they present, if we reserve the right to our own individual judgment as to that plan. It is to their honor that if they believed the plan that they originally presented here was not in accordance with the general sentiment of the country or the Senate that they change their mind, even though it be overnight, and present another plan. Consistency has been declared to be the virtue of small minds, in any event. We are not, however, bound by it.

We legislate usually through committees; but there is an appeal from the judgment of the committee to the judgment of the Senate, and I am glad there is an appeal from the judgment of the Senate to the judgment of the greater court of the people of this country. That greater court, that greater jury, will have their day to pass judgment upon certain provisions of this tax bill. I am not going to discuss its details. There is very much to be said in favor of the plan that the Senate committee have finally proposed, so that great fortunes outside of war profits shall not escape taxation; but I can not quite understand how in 8 or 10 weeks of discussion in the committee and close analysis and testimony they did not discover, as the Senator from Utah has to-day suggested, that the plan they presented would lose a half billion dollars of taxation.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a correction at that point?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. When the committee started out, the general sentiment of the committee was that we ought not to raise much more than a billion dollars or a billion five hundred million dollars. It was also fully realized by the committee that it would not be wise, in this bill, to exhaust all the sources of taxation. The committee did not by any means start out on a program of exhausting every possible source of taxation. We wanted to leave something to the future. Later on it became very evident that more money would be needed, and the committee without altering its view at all or changing its base put the 10 per cent maximum in in order to get $400,000,000 more. The committee always knew that source of taxation was there, but they started out to raise a much less sum than was finally thought to be necessary. It was the changed estimates of the Treasury Department which prompted the committee to get this increased amount.

Mr. KENYON. Was the committee willing that the great profits that we hear spoken of here, such as the Ford profits, should under any plan escape taxation?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; on the logical and technical interpretation of a war-profits tax, which was what the committee originally contemplated, where there were no war profits the committee could logically conclude that no tax should be imposed.

Mr. KENYON. I became convinced—

Mr. PENROSE. It is very easy to use garbled expressions and to misinterpret or to put a misconstruction upon the action of the committee, but the committee was logical and consistent throughout the whole transaction.

Mr. KENYON. I am not using any garbled expressions.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator comes pretty nearly doing it.

Mr. KENYON. I am not using any garbled expressions about that at all. I realize full well that the committee did not exhaust the sources of taxation when they took some $560,000,000 in taxes out of a supposed aggregate of about three billion of war profits. The statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania does not add to our knowledge as to that. Everyone knows that there is a distinct cleavage in this body and in the country on this war-tax question.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, the line of cleavage seems to be between a very large majority and a very small remnant.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; it does in the Senate. The line of cleavage in the country, however, is between about 100,000,000 people and a minority of the Senate on the one side, and three or four million people perhaps, and a majority of the Senate on the other side. The line of cleavage is between those who hold the view that we can not impose larger taxation on war profits without injuring business and in that way injuring the prosecution of the war—and strong arguments, of course, have been made and can be made on that question. On the other side those, few in number in the Senate I grant, who believe that the question of social unrest in this country is just as fundamental a proposition to consider in connection with the success of the war as the question of disturbing business. These men do not want to injure business, of course; do not want to diminish the high efficiency of business; but do maintain that we ought to take more of the war profits, more of the great incomes of this country, than this bill takes. They are honest in their judgment, and the men who believe that we have gone to the extreme limit of what we can take and still safeguard business are honest in their judgment. That is the line of cleavage; that is the issue.

Mr. President, we were practically told in the early stages of the discussion by Senators upon this floor that those who were endeavoring to have imposed under the terms of this bill higher taxes upon swollen fortunes—I withdraw the word "swollen," because it is offensive, and will say the large fortunes—and tremendous war profits are trying to weaken their country in this hour of peril, and that the fight was instigated by those who oppose the war, and that the purpose thereof was to make the war unpopular. We have been told that also by certain newspapers in this country.

I do not believe, Mr. President, that any set of men in this country or in this body have any monopoly of patriotism. It has been customary here, I know, when certain Senators favored certain measures and other Senators opposed them to claim that the Senators in opposition were trying to injure the prosecution of the war. That is a pretty old and threadbare argument. It is very much like the advice of the old counselor who said, "When in court, and you have no case, abuse the attorney on the other side."

Approximately 377,000 people in this country paid an income tax in 1915. They represent, I presume, 1,500,000 people in round numbers. Will putting additional taxation upon them—not an unreasonable taxation—tend to make the war unpopular or will it tend to make the war unpopular to put upon the 18,000,000 representing seventy or eighty million more taxes on coffee, tea, and sugar?

According to the philosophy of the argument that has been presented, to refuse to place this additional tax upon the great profits and to place irritating little taxes upon consumption will be a popular move. This bill is based upon a peculiar theory. It is proposed to popularize this war by placing taxes on parcel-post packages—a provision to that effect is in the bill now, but I think it will not be in the bill after it is voted on in the Senate—on telegrams, on telephones, on fishing rods, on checkerboards, on coffee, on postum, on tea, on cocoa, on sugar. Where is the free sugar bowl we have heard so much about in the Democratic platforms and the Democratic campaign books? Does anybody really believe when he makes that kind of a statement on this floor that this kind of taxes would tend to make the war popular?

I remember that after the passage of the Dingley law whenever a housewife went into a store to buy anything and the price had gone up the enterprising and polite merchant always said, "It is due to the Dingley tariff law." So they made that law in that way mighty unpopular. Now, when the head of a family takes a day off to go fishing and discovers that he has to pay a tax on fishing rods, trivial as the amount may be, or when the enthusiastic inhabitants of Squash Center gather around the checkerboard for an exhilarating game of checkers and discover that the checkerboard is taxed, are those things going to produce popularity? When the breakfast table and the lunch table of the people of this country are taxed, is that going to help to make the war popular?

The poor people of this country—and I know that when they are referred to in this way here we are met with sneers; but it is the truth, and everybody knows it that the poor people of this country can not stand any more taxation. We have been told by Senators that the poor people wanted to bring their mite and place it in the Treasury of the Government. Yes, they do; and they have brought their mite. We are practically commandeering the purchasing power of the dollars they earn. The man with a thousand-dollar salary in this country endeavoring to raise a family—and some men around this Capitol are trying to raise families on $65 a month—can not stand a $10 or $20 tax as well as the man with an income of $2,000,000 can stand a tax of $1,990,000. One means self-sacrifice, the other no sacrifice.

I said some time ago on the floor, and I was denounced as an anarchist by certain papers for saying it, that during this war no man ought to have an income of over $100,000. But the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] on yesterday went me 90 per cent better and took the position that no man ought to have an income of over $10,000 during these trying times. I agree with him.

The cost of living has gone up in this country nearly 100 per cent; wages have not gone up over 23 per cent; and the everyday family in this country is having a hard enough time without any more taxation.

I desire to place in the RECORD at this point a brief extract from the report of the food committee appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, which made an investigation in the District of Columbia in 1913. The committee says:

Interesting figures were obtained from the proprietors of some of the smaller stores, whose business is with the poorer people. They show clearly that the poor have been compelled to resort to the strictest economy in order to provide food on account of the high prices. Their purchases are of the cheapest possible articles and in smaller quantities than heretofore. The sale of the ordinary cuts of meats in this class of stores seems to have been discontinued and the meat now purchased consists of hog livers, hog kidneys, neck bones, hog faces—

And so forth.

Do you think that the people of this country who are living on small salaries and small wages, who are compelled to resort to such products for their meat, and then are required to pay a tax, however small, on sugar, tea, and coffee are going to enthuse very much when they discover that under the plan of taxation here proposed for this year the United States Steel Co., after the payment of the taxes, will have about $300,000,000 left—nearly a million dollars for every working day in the year?

I know that anybody who refers to these things is called by some a demagogue, currying favor with the common people; by others accused of insulting the common people; but men can stand on the floor and burn their incense to the great captains of industry in this country for purposes perhaps of future political capitalization and there is no charge of any demagogism in that. Oh, no; that is patriotism. Go ahead and tax the sugar bowl of the country, the breakfast table of the country; go ahead and tax the telephone messages and the telegraph messages; crush out your little papers by taxes on advertising. When the people of this country come to a close analysis of the situation, and reason out that Congress has conscripted life, and then conscripted wealth at the ratio of about 31 per cent, I wonder if this will be such a popular bill as has been suggested. When the people around the firesides of this country come to inquire soberly and seriously whether the money of plutocracy is more sacred than the lives of democracy, you will find out how popular your method of taxation is. It would be a good thing if Congress could adjourn and go home for 10 days and talk it over with the folks and find out what they think about it.

Mr. President, we must raise this money, of course. We must raise the money to win this war if it takes every dollar in this country, just as we will win this war if it takes every drop of blood in this country. Men can honestly differ as to how it should be raised. There is no use of impugning anybody's motives because they may differ with us as to the proper way to do. We are all patriotic. We are all willing to give up what we have, whether it be money or whether it be life. The school of thought that would raise it all by bonds—I think it is not large—certainly is not practical. The other, which would raise it entirely by taxation, has few followers. We can not raise it all by taxation. It is nonsense to talk about it. The sensible way, of course, and that advocated by the great majority, is by a combination of bonds and taxes. The proper relationship thereof is the serious question. The amount to be raised, as shown by the figures of the Senator from Utah, is appalling, but we do not shrink from it.

Phillips Brooks used to pray, not to lessen our burdens, but to give us strength to carry them. That is what we are going to do in this Nation. We are not going to shirk burdens and flee from them. We will develop strength to carry them. We will raise, outside of what is embraced in loans to allies, according to the Senator from Utah, some twelve billions of dollars. We pass the seven billions on, in a spirit of kindness, to posterity. This bill raises a little over two and a half billions.

Whatever plan we follow our Nation is financially safe. I am not disturbed about the financial condition of our country. We have unbounded confidence in the financial ability of our Nation. A recent issue of the North America Review has a most interesting article on this question. In five wars before the present one we only had two serious difficulties in the financial line. Hamilton made possible our successful national finance. As Webster said of him:

He smote the rock of the national resources, and abundant streams of revenue gushed forth. He touched the dead corpse of political credit, and it sprang to its feet.

The result of Hamilton's financial policy placed us in a situation where, at the beginning of the War of 1812, the national debt had been cut down to $45,000,000. While we had difficulties after the War of 1812 our recovery thereafter was rapid. The Mexican War was inexpensive. We had to provide for about one hundred millions of extraordinary revenue. There was no difficulty in floating the loans. At the end of that war our debt was only about sixty-three millions, which was continually reduced until, at the beginning of Buchanan's administration, it was about twenty-nine millions.

We entered upon the Civil War under unfavorable financial conditions. The Buchanan administration ended with a debt of some eighty-eight millions. We were making short-term loans for current expenses. Twenty-year bonds were selling at a discount. Notwithstanding all this, we came through the Civil War in good financial condition. The total of the war loans was in the neighborhood of $4,000,000,000. In September, 1865, the war debt was $2,846,000,000. Against this there was $88,000,000 in the Treasury.

How is it with the present situation? We entered this war with a net debt of a little over $1,000,000,000 and a half billion dollars in bonds authorized, but not issued. On April 24 we authorized a new loan of $7,000,000,000, so that the authorized national indebtedness is now about $8,500,000,000. That is more than any nation in the world ever had before the present war, and it seems to us an enormous indebtedness. But when we take into consideration the conditions of the country at the time of former loans and the condition of the country now as to wealth, it is comparatively not so large a loan. To get at the true situation we must take the ratio between debt and the wealth of the debtor. A man who is worth $1,000 and is $500 in debt is in vastly worse condition than a man who is worth $2,000 and $500 in debt.

At this time our indebtedness of eight and one-half billion amounts to practically $83 per capita. The debt of 1865, $2,846,000,000, with a population of about 35,000,000, is a per capita indebtedness of $83, or the same as now. Further, in 1865 the average per capita wealth of the Nation was about $600 and the per capita indebtedness $83, or about 14 per cent. Now our per capita wealth is over $2,000, but let us call it even $2,000. We have against this an indebtedness of $83, or a little above 4 per cent. To be, then, in the condition we were at the time of the Civil War would involve us in an indebtedness three and a half times the eight and one-half billion, or $29,750,000,000.

Great Britain's indebtedness is now approximately $382 per capita, or 21 per cent of the national wealth, and no one questions Great Britain's financial stability. In order to equal Great Britain's financial condition we would have to multiply eight and one-half billion by 5, or $42,500,000,000.

France's debt when she went into the war was $6,607,000,000. That was $160 per capita. Now the debt has risen to $18,000,000,000, or $455 per capita. This is seven times ours, which would allow us $59,500,000,000 of indebtedness to equal the condition of France.

Germany had before the war a debt of $73.62 per capita. To-day her debt is approximately $17,000,000,000, which means $255 per capita, or 22 per cent of the national wealth. So, to be in Germany's position we would have to extend our bonded indebtedness to at least $47,000,000,000.

So we will have no trouble in this country, even on the issuance of bonded indebtedness, for it will be a long time before we reach the point of danger.

This bill raises a little over two and a half billion dollars of the twelve billion. Other sources of revenue will raise up to some four billion; but if all the bonds now provided for were issued we would still have to raise a very large amount by another bond issue. Are we justified in passing this all on to posterity? We could certainly raise on war profits, incomes, liquors, and luxuries approximately three and one-half billions of dollars and cut down the bond issues.

Great Britain, as has been suggested here so often, without her business ruined—indeed, with her business prosperous, after three years of a tremendous war—has an 80 per cent tax on war profits. If we had levied that, according to the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], we would have raised approximately $3,200,000,000 on this tax alone. Conscription these large incomes, with liquor taxes and taxes on luxuries, would raise around four and a half billion dollars.

Mr. President, with all this money to raise, with these tremendous war profits, running to approximately the figures that have been given here so many times, is Congress justified and is Congress doing its duty when it takes only the sums that are provided by this bill? Have we reached the limit of where it will affect business? When the committee on their original proposition took some $562,000,000 we were told that we had reached the limit, where further taxation would affect business. If we have reached the point where it would decrease the efficiency of business we ought to go no further; but it will be pretty hard to convince the American people that concerns that were making 10 or 12 per cent in times of peace, that built up tremendous fortunes under those percentages, are being injured when percentages of over 50 per cent are left after taking a 60 per cent tax.

Mr. President, business will have to do its part in this struggle. Business will do its part, but it is no time for unreasonable profits. If the profits are cut down on those things that are sold to the Government, there will be less of taxes to raise.

Now, just one illustration—the Du Pont Powder Co. that we heard about yesterday in the speech of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] had net earnings in 1913 of $4,582,075. In 1916 its net earnings were $82,107,693, in round numbers. The prewar average, I think it fair to say, for the years taken under the original plan of the committee, would be about $6,000,000. I am not giving the figures exactly accurately, but that would be the limit, I am sure. Deducting that from the $82,000,000 would leave $76,000,000. An 80 per cent tax on that would be approximately $60,000,000. Eighty per cent, then, taken from the war profits would still leave a balance of $22,000,000. Eighty-two millions, the earnings in 1916, according to the tables placed in the Record by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], are equal to an earning of 126 per cent on the common stock. Twenty-two million dollars left after deducting an 80 per cent war-profits tax would leave earnings of at least 31 per cent on the common stock. Now, if we should take 62 per cent tax, as I had intended to propose the amendment, but considered it was of no use to do so and useless to take the time of the Senate with it, under the view the Senate took of this prewar proposition—a 62 per cent prewar-profits tax would be approximately $47,000,000, leaving about $35,000,000 after the payment of that war-profits tax.

The earning of $82,000,000 giving 126 per cent, the deduction of the 60 per cent war-profits tax, would leave $35,000,000, or over 50 per cent on the common stock after taking a 62 per cent war-profits tax. Do you think you are going to make the American people believe that you are going to ruin the Du Pont Powder Co. by leaving them 50 per cent on their common stock?

The owners of the Du Pont Powder Co. made their great fortunes out of peace-time profits and now they are making 126 per cent on common stock. The 62 per cent tax would leave them 50 per cent dividends on common stock. Oh, how enthusiastic that will make the people in the country paying their taxes upon coffee and tea and sugar! Why should these great concerns like the Du Pont Powder Co. make and keep these enormous profits that, in their case at least, are made entirely out of the things that go to kill men?

The President has taken hold not of that particular matter but of other matters where excessive profits are involved. The President, with great courage and skill, has endeavored to take "the profit out of profiteering." He has had to come out and indict with his pen some of these great interests in this country and has announced the doctrine that profit and patriotism can not go together in this war. If concerns like the Du Pont Powder Co., with these enormous profits, say to the people of this country, "If you are going to stop us from making these profits, we are going to quit business," they will find that we have a man in the White House who is courageous enough to take hold of them and say, "We will run this business ourselves," and the Government will take it over and run it.

I am not alarmed about these great concerns being unpatriotic. It is an indictment of their patriotism to say that they want to keep all these great war profits. I do not believe it. They are willing to do their part. Some of their advocates here ask more for them than they themselves ask.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KENYON. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Has the Senator ever heard of one of those plutocratic gentlemen coming to Congress and asking that a tax be levied upon him?

Mr. KENYON. No; I have not; but I know Senators in this body who have telegrams or letters from some of those men in their States who are not asking for all the defense that is being made of them here.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think that is entirely true, Mr. President. I think there are just as patriotic men possessed of large wealth as men who are possessed of none; but, evidently, somebody is asking that special exemption or special favor be extended in congressional enactment to the great financial interests.

Mr. KENYON. Oh, well, of course, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] suggests, there are not many here protesting against the fight that is being made for them, or, in fact, anybody. I am contending that profits may become so excessive that they are practically treasonable profits, and that no one desires to disturb reasonable profits unless it becomes necessary. Reasonable profits, not treasonable profits, should be the rule during this war.

We have been told that future generations would enjoy paying for this war, or a large part of it, and that posterity will be proud to assume the burden. Of course the fight that is now going on is for the benefit of posterity, and to some extent posterity will be glad to assume a portion of the burden. Prosperity as well as posterity ought to carry a large part of this burden. The fight that we are now making to make this country safe for the American people to live in is of benefit to posterity. They will have to pay the larger portion of it in any event.

We have been told that they will revere their ancestors for what they have done. That is true. We have been told that they will shed no blood in this contest, and hence ought to carry a heavier burden. In a measure that is true, and that is one reason why the proposition we have been fighting for here is also true. The heavy part of this burden proposed now is not going to be borne by those who will shed the blood.

Succeeding generations will have to maintain high rates of taxation to pay pensions—will be busy with the new industrial questions that are coming on. Posterity will be amply busy.

It has been suggested that they will regard their ancestors as great geniuses. So they will; they ought to—financial geniuses, who can pass on to them in one year some eight or ten billions of bonds and themselves pay three or four billions in taxation. They undoubtedly will erect monuments to their ancestors—they ought to—and garland them with forget-me-nots; but in order to be entirely appropriate the monuments ought to be erected of brass, with a large part of the head space devoted to cheek.

Mr. President, there is no use of thinking men in this country playing the ostrich and burying their heads in the sand. There is not a bit of use of our in any way deceiving ourselves. There is no use of failing to observe what is going on in this country. I do not believe the greatest danger to our country is in armies from without. I believe the greatest danger to our country is from unrest within. This Nation is strong enough to meet any force from without; it is strong enough to meet any sedition or traitorism within its borders, and to put it down. That is not the trouble. There is trouble in this country, and it is among people, many of them, who are devoted to this country and who will give their lives gladly for this country, but who have a feeling growing in their hearts that great wealth in this country is not only arrogant and powerful but that it has too much to say about legislation. They do not ask charity; they simply ask for justice. Justice means just taxation; and if the rich people of this country with the tremendous fortunes will not meet the public a little more than halfway, if they are not willing that just taxation shall be meted out to them now, I am afraid nothing can stop injustice being done to them in the future.

Let us think well and deliberate carefully before we increase social unrest in this country. Unjust taxation will produce socialism and socialists in this country faster than we can produce fighters, I fear. People feel, though the argument is sneered at, especially in the cloakrooms, that since Congress has voted conscription of men, it can not justify itself if it does not vote conscription of great incomes and great war profits. There is a feeling among the people—and if you will get out among them, you will find it out; if you will go home and study it, you will soon ascertain it—that if the conscription of men is right, the conscription of wealth is right.

If the boys who go to the front come back with all their bodies and with faculties unimpaired, those boys will be satisfied and delighted. None of the $30 a month will be left and they will not care anything about it. If men with great wealth have their business intact at the end of the war and if the Government should use this wealth during the war, they could not complain even if the Government used it without any interest.

We are up to the question of the taxation of this great wealth and taxing it heavily or taxing the necessities of the people. If war profits are not taxed now to a large extent and the war comes to an end, of course they never can be taxed, and the great taxes will have to be raised on consumption. We can take our choice.

Mr. President, this is not a warfare upon the rich people of this country. The people only ask justice as to them.

They must realize that, like everyone else, their patriotism is on trial and there must be no money slackers in the Nation. They are just as contemptible as military slackers. I am not questioning the patriotism of the rich. The sons of wealthy men have gone out and are going out and have offered their services and their lives to the country. When young Fish went to Cuba in the Spanish War, a rich man's son, and was killed it did more to dissolve the clouds of socialism that were gathering over this country than anything which had happened in the previous 20 years. We simply have to tax the wealthy, and tax them because they have the wealth. It is a condition and not a theory.

The poor people of this country can not give up much more in money. They have a hard time now to pay car fare, buy shoes, coal, and any meat at all, and if they see the holders of great fortunes merely putting extra flags on automobiles and trying to avoid taxation that hurts, it will not tend to domestic tranquillity or to popularize the war.

God's tolling poor have no yachts upon the seas, no summer palaces, no ocean-swept bungalows, but just hot kitchens, crowded tenements, hungry children; no blue sky, no green grass, no future but toil and work. We can not add to their burdens without crushing out their lives.

When the Senator from Idaho in his eloquent speech yesterday referred to the conscription of men and the shirking of dollars, there ran through my mind the poem of Hood, "The Song of the Shirt." May I paraphrase a line of that?—

Oh God, that wealth should be so dear
And flesh and blood so cheap!

The argument is made that if we take this large tax there will be nothing left for charity. I do not like that argument, Mr. President, and I think it is an argument that is resented a good deal in this country. The people of this country are not asking charity, but justice. If we had more of justice, there would be less need for charity. We are not a nation of Lazaruses seeking crumbs that fall from the rich man's table. Gain and greed will probably always go on while human hearts are the same, but it ought not to be so in war times.

I place in the RECORD at this point a table of profits of large concerns. I ask permission to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Net profits of American industrial corporations.

[Figures shown are the net profits earned for the stockholders, after deducting cost of materials, labor, depreciation, overhead, interest, and all other charges. All figures are official, having been taken from the companies' annual reports.]

* 19 months.

* Deficit.

* 16 months.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not going to detain the Senate. In fact, I did not intend to talk so long. I have talked because I feel a deep conviction on this question of social unrest as bearing on the success of the war. You can not have enthusiastic people behind the guns, behind the boys in the trenches, if the people get the idea that they are being unjustly dealt with in taxation. The views that have been expressed by many on this floor, going out to the country, to some extent give them that idea. It is in the minds of many of them, Senators must know from their correspondence, that this bill does not put a heavy enough tax upon these great fortunes. The taxation of articles of consumption should go out of this bill.

Mr. President, we have divergent views as to what is best for our country and as to just what taxation is proper. It is the glory of our Government that we have freedom and diversity of opinion. Why talk on the one side about those seeking higher taxes attempting to make the war unpopular or opposing the war? Such talk is nonsense. We need more cooperation in our Government, cooperation between the President and Congress, cooperation between both bodies of Congress, cooperation here on this floor, not any self-opinionated ideas that cast discredit on those who differ with us.

It has been a glorious thing that we have gotten away from politics in this country for the time. There is no politics here. We are not Republicans or Democrats in this crisis, we are just Americans, each doing that which he thinks is best for his country.

There may be a few people in this Nation who do not want the American arms to win. They are few. I do not believe there are any in Congress. For myself, much as I deplore war, I believe that this world contest must go on until the Kaiser shall be forced to take his bloody hands off of Belgium and France; that it must go on until we can have a peace that will mean the disarmament of the great military forces of the world; that it must go on until Prussian militarism has been removed as a menace to the world; that it must go on until it is certain that in this country our people shall have the right to live and develop and enjoy life without any menace from the murderous house of Hohenzollern.

Everyone wants peace, of course, if it can be peace with honor, peace with safety, peace that is permanent, peace that makes it impossible in the future for ambitious sovereigns to plunge the world into war. It is because I am so anxious to see a unity of purpose among our people, a more cohesive citizenship, a spirit of self-sacrifice, and an awakening of the whole soul of our Nation, more of concord and less of discord, that I am pleading with this body not to permit a bill to be passed in such form that it will create irritation, suspicion, dissension, and unrest among 100,000,000 of our people. Not to let a bill be passed in such form that the people may come to believe the words of a distinguished Democratic leader in this body, whom I quoted in commencing, that it will work out a philosophy of taxation "giving to him that hath and taking from him that hath not even that which he hath."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not rise to speak, I probably will address the Senate to-morrow previous to a vote on this amendment, but I do rise to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WADSWORTH in the chair). The Senator from Illinois suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	Lodge	Sherman
Bankhead	Harding	McCumber	Shields
Borah	Hollis	McKellar	Simmons
Brady	Husting	McNary	Smith, Md.
Brandeggee	James	Nelson	Smith, Mich.

Gerry	La Follette	Shafroth	Williams
Gronna	Lewis	Sheppard	Wolcott

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a word in explanation of this amendment. All day yesterday we were told that the Bethlehem Steel Co., the United States Steel Co., and the Du Pont Powder Co. should be forced to pay a greater percentage of excess war profits than the committee substitute provided for.

Mr. President, this amendment means that all three of those companies will pay but 50 per cent of their excess war profits instead of a graduated tax from 12 per cent to 60 per cent, as the committee substitute provides. All that these companies and companies like them are relieved of by the decrease from the average rate of the committee substitute to 50 per cent will fall upon the small corporations, who make from 15 per cent increase profits up; or, in other words, on corporations who make only a 15 per cent increase over the prewar period under the committee amendment the rate of taxation will be 12 per cent and under the pending amendment would be 50 per cent.

This amendment means that such a corporation is to be taxed not 12 per cent but 50 per cent, and so it will be in decreased proportion in each one of the brackets provided for in the committee substitute. I do not believe the Senate is ready to do it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question. I understand the Senator contends that 50 per cent proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire would make the companies that pay 50 per cent under the Senate committee bill pay less than the Senate committee amendment. That is the Senator's contention?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I think the average is a little less.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator, then, would it make the United States Steel Corporation pay less than under the Senate committee proposal?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be somewhat less.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to state to the Senator that under the Senate committee amendment the United States Steel—

Mr. SMOOT. I am not talking of the year 1916.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; we are talking of this year.

Mr. SMOOT. The profits that they will make this year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to suggest to the Senator that every statement made yesterday on the subject was that the United States Steel will pay under this 60 per cent bracket not 60 per cent but only about 37 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems there is not anybody here who knows what will be done under this bill. The Senator from North Carolina in charge of the bill said yesterday that under that 60 per cent bracket, upon a supposed income of $490,000,000 profit, it would pay $183,000,000. Now, that is just a little over 37 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, 15 per cent pays a certain rate, 25 per cent pays a certain rate, until it reaches 300 per cent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is exactly what I wanted brought out. The statement the Senator from Utah made just a moment ago, in my judgment, is not correct, and if we make them pay 50 per cent they will pay more than under this 60 per cent bracket of the committee, which, as a matter of fact, makes them pay only about 37 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the case. The average rate under the first amendment of the committee, ranging from 12 per cent up to 50 per cent, was 44½ per cent. We have added another bracket carrying a 10 per cent increase. The United States Steel Co. would fall under that bracket for a portion of its earnings, and it would be a proportion of the 10 per cent over and above the 44½ per cent on the whole of the earnings of the company.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then the Senator from North Carolina had better revise his figures, because he stated that with $490,000,000 profit they would pay a tax of $183,000,000, and that is 37 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The rate of percentage would be after deducting all the exemptions allowed in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not talking about exemptions. I am talking about the amendment and the bracket as it is framed.

Mr. SMOOT. I am talking about the amendment—and the average rate of the committee substitute is greater than named by the Senator. Under the Hollis amendment, with a flat rate of 50 per cent, the revenue would be $2,000,000,000. Under the committee substitute it would be $1,286,000,000. Let us consider where the increased amount will come from. Who is to pay it? It is to be paid by corporations that under the committee substitute fall in the lower brackets. That is where the additional amount is to come from, and it can not come from any other source. The proposal is for a flat rate of 50 per cent of all profits, whether the increase was 15 per cent over the prewar period or 1,000 per cent. You can not get away from that fact. That is exactly what it means, and nothing else.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BORAH. There is really a great deal of bewilderment here as we listen one day to one member of the committee and another day to another member of the committee. The Senator says that the United States Steel Corporation would escape under this 50 per cent flat rate a portion of the tax which it would have to pay under the committee amendment. Upon yesterday it was stated the United States Steel Corporation would pay more under the 50 per cent rate.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know who made the statement. I know that the average rate under the first amendment was 44.1 per cent, and I know we have added one bracket with an increase of 10 per cent, making a 60 per cent bracket.

Mr. BORAH. But before you get to that bracket you must have 300 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Just the same as we did in the first place. We had the identical brackets and same percentages as we have now, with the exception of the 6 per cent bracket affecting increases of profits over 300 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator's objection to the 50 per cent is that it will let off such corporations as the United States Steel, the Bethlehem, the Du Pont Powder Co., from the tax which would be imposed under the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I mention that as a minor one. My great objection to the amendment is that it imposes an extra burden upon the company that is only making an increased profit of 15 per cent. Under the Senate substitute there is imposed a tax of 12 per cent, and under the amendment now offered by the Senator from New Hampshire there will be imposed upon that same company a rate of 50 per cent. That is what I am complaining of. I do not believe we can justify it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I have listened for some weeks now to various Members here telling us that they have gone to the limit of 60 per cent in taxing these great corporations. I just listened to the distinguished Senator from Utah voicing his objection to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire in the language that the Senator from New Hampshire would tax but 50 per cent, while under the amendment of the committee the committee would tax 60 per cent. What he said was that great corporations like the United States Steel Corporation would thereby be benefited by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire.

I say to you, Mr. President, in no invidious sense at all, that the 60 per cent bracket that is levied here is a delusion and a snare, and there is not, in fact, any 60 per cent that is levied upon the United States Steel Corporation by the amendment presented by the committee.

I repeat to you and I ask you to follow the figures, because this part of this discussion is just of a piece with the discussion that we have had upon this bill for the last 10 days. The figures given by the chairman of the Finance Committee yesterday, iterated and reiterated in the RECORD again and again, are as follows: That the profits for 1917 of the United States Steel Corporation will be $490,000,000; that the tax that will be paid under the bracket which was so generously accorded to the Senate by the Finance Committee, the bracket of 60 per cent, would be $183,000,000. From the records that are before us in the majority and the minority reports that have been submitted, the prewar profits of the Steel Corporation were $63,000,000. Its war profits, therefore, are the difference between $490,000,000 and $63,000,000 prewar profits, a remainder of $427,000,000. The percentage that would be paid under the 60 per cent bracket by the United States Steel Corporation, if computed upon the total profit, would be 37 plus, and the percentage under the boasted 60 per cent bracket of the committee that would be paid by the United States Steel Corporation, if based upon war profits alone, would be 42.85 per cent.

So your 60 per cent does not mean 60 per cent, at least so far as this corporation is concerned whose figures have been given to us, and it is the only one to which I have access. Sixty per cent presented to us by the committee means 42.85 per cent upon war profits; 37 per cent plus upon the total amount of profits. So I submit that the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire would do just what it is designed to do; it would make these corporations pay a larger sum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no delusion and snare in the tax imposed by the committee substitute. The tax imposed under the committee substitute is drawn in the same form as every other graduated tax is drawn. It is computed in the same way and upon the same basis and the Senator from California can not draw one otherwise. No member of the committee has undertaken to convey the impression suggested by the Senator. If the Senator from California will follow me, I will inform him of the percentage of every bracket there is in the amendment, and he will see that the statement he made as to the rate of taxation on the Steel Corporation is not correct. I am informed, however, by the Senator from North Carolina that he made the estimate of the revenue of $183,000,000 from the United States Steel Corporation after deducting the exemptions from the gross profit rather than the profit of $490,000,000. The estimated profits being more than $490,000,000 for the year of 1917.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. As I stated, that is not changed. I figured that $490,000,000 was the amount to be taxed after the exemptions were made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to complete my statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will you yield to one question?

Mr. SMOOT. I will then yield to any question the Senator wants to ask.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is the statement made to us yesterday, repeated again and again, correct, that the amount of tax which would be derived from the Steel Corporation is $183,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. On the basis the Senator states now I have not figured it; but that is an entirely different proposition from what I stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. This is what I have presented.

Mr. SMOOT. The basis of the statement yesterday was that they made a profit of $490,000,000, which would be taxed under this bracket after the exemptions were made; but the estimated earnings will be over $530,000,000, and the exemptions are from that amount and not $490,000,000; and this fact will make quite a difference, to prove which I want to call the Senator's attention to the percentage of every bracket in the title.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will not the Senator do me the kindness to take the figures I have just repeated to the Senate and demonstrate their inaccuracy?

Mr. SMOOT. I will demonstrate it.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If they are inaccurate, I shall be glad to concede it. If they are accurate, I am sure the Senator from Utah will be glad to concede it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will be glad to show that the statement was wrong, taking the actual conditions into consideration.

Mr. President, I will now refer to each of the brackets in the title, naming the rates of taxes to be collected. Under the first bracket of 12 per cent, of course, there will be collected 12 per cent. Then, in the following bracket—16 per cent—there will be collected 13.6 per cent. If the Senator from California doubts these figures, let him compare them with the committee reports.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator answer a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One at a time. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that I have questioned no such figures. I have given the figures furnished by the Finance Committee concerning the United States Steel Corporation; those are the only figures that I have given; they are the only ones recited and the only percentages which are computed.

Mr. SMOOT. I am giving the figures that I have given before. Under the 20 per cent bracket there will be a tax collected of 16½ per cent; under the 25 per cent bracket 19½ per cent; under the 30 per cent bracket of 22½ per cent; under the 35 per cent bracket 26½ per cent; under the 40 per cent bracket 29½ per cent; under the 45 per cent bracket 32½ per cent; under the 50 per cent bracket—and that was the limit in the bill before the substitute was offered—the rate will be 44½ per cent, and the committee has added one bracket to the 44½ per cent, or an additional 10 per cent bracket.

The Du Pont Powder Co., the Bethlehem Steel Co., and also the United States Steel Co. will fall under the 60 per cent bracket, if the gains are as estimated for the year 1917 prove correct.

Mr. NELSON. What per cent was added?

Mr. SMOOT. A 10 per cent bracket on all over and above the 44½ per cent bracket as I have said. Mr. President, there is no question about this. The Senator says that under the amendment with the 10 per cent added there will only be collected 37 per cent when under the original amendment under the highest bracket there would be 44½ per cent collected.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Are not those the computations which the Senator gave us a couple of weeks ago?

Mr. SMOOT. They are.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Were not those computations made upon a different basis?

Mr. SMOOT. They were not made upon any different basis. Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is there not a different basis to-day for the Senator's computation?

Mr. SMOOT. That will make no difference at all with the general imposition of a tax under the bracket system.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But it will make a difference in the percentages.

Mr. SMOOT. I am saying to the Senator now that the profits of the three institutions to which I have called his attention will amount to more than an increase of 300 per cent, and therefore they fall within the higher bracket.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I do not wish to be insistent with the Senator, and if he prefers that I shall not further interrupt him—

Mr. SMOOT. All I want to get at is the truth.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then I want to ask the Senator, are the figures that I quoted correct—$490,000,000 of profits for the United States Steel Corporation for the year 1917?

Mr. SMOOT. On the basis of the two quarters that have already been reported there will be more than $500,000,000 of profits.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. And that is the only estimate we can make, based upon the reports so far made this year by the company.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then my estimate of $490,000,000 is below the real figure, and nobody, I presume, will quarrel with it. Am I correct in the statement that it was repeatedly asserted here yesterday that the total tax of the United States Steel Corporation under the new bracket would be $183,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I think, Mr. President, that the Senator from North Carolina so stated.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMOOT. But he allowed on the $490,000,000 reported as gain all the exemptions on that basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That was necessary in figuring the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. If the gain should be more than that, it would make quite a difference.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator question, if I may be permitted to ask him—and only with his consent do I ask him—

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator may ask me any question he desires.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Does the Senator question that $183,000,000 is a 37+ percentage of $490,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I take the Senator's word for it, though I can figure it in a few minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think it is fairly accurate. Now, next, does the Senator question that the prewar profits were $63,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. The average, I think, was $63,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The total war profits, therefore, will the Senator concede, were $427,000,000?

I have taken the difference between $490,000,000 and $63,000,000, and the Senator says I am below the amount.

Mr. SMOOT. Every question that the Senator is asking he is asking upon a different basis entirely from the statement I made. If the corporation should make, as it has been stated they would make, based upon the first two-quarters of this year, over $500,000,000, the computation would be entirely different.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then the tax on four hundred and twenty-seven millions of war profits would be 42.85 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but there will be a great deal more than $427,000,000 of war profits.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Then they would pay even a less per cent. I have given the Senator the benefit of some percentage, because on a tax of $183,000,000 on $427,000,000 of war profits gives 42.85 per cent which the corporation would pay under the 60 per cent bracket. The Senate may determine who is justified in the statement of the particular computation.

Mr. SMOOT. I want again to say to the Senate of the United States that nobody can deny—and Senators may if they desire take the figures for each bracket as furnished by the expert of the department—that under that bracket as the committee first reported it the highest tax imposed was 44.1 per cent. There is not a change in any of the brackets, with the single exception of the addition of 10 per cent bracket for all profits over 300 per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. In order that we may understand just exactly what is meant, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what purpose is there now in any suggestion of prewar earnings of $63,000,000, and deducting that from the $490,000,000, inasmuch as now the committee is making its basis on everything above 6 per cent and 10 per cent, without reference to whether the prewar earnings were $63,000,000 or $6,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was basing his figures upon the first amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. In order that I may have this matter entirely clear in my mind, I wish to ask a question: I understand the Senator from Utah to state that the amount of taxes which a corporation earning 300 per cent of what it earned during the prewar period would pay under the present proposition would be 54½ per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. It would pay 44½ per cent plus the proportions of 10 per cent the profits would be over 300 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. Fifty-four and one-tenth per cent of what—of the net profits over those of the prewar period?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the profits that are to be taxed, with the exemptions allowed.

Mr. WEEKS. Then, 54½ per cent on $490,000,000 would be something like $275,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the exact amount.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be the tax that the United States Steel Co. would pay under this bill. The tax would be something like $275,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, if the amount of profits be $490,000,000, after allowing the exemptions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask a question? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Is not the Senator from Utah assuming in the answer that he just made that the increase of 10 per cent would be applicable to the entire excess profits of the Steel Corporation?

Mr. SMOOT. I said in my statement previously that it would apply to whatever percentage of profits there was over and above the 300 per cent; whatever there was above that would take the increased per cent. I could not say what that 10 per cent would yield until I knew what proportion of the whole profits were over 300 per cent. The Senator from Washington is right.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wanted myself to understand the answer of the Senator from Utah. I understood his answer to the Senator from Massachusetts to clearly state the increased 10 per cent under the 60 per cent bracket applied to the entire excess profits, whereas, as a matter of fact, it only applies to those profits which are 300 per cent over the exemption.

Mr. SMOOT. Over the exemption.

Mr. President, I think the Senate thoroughly understands the matter. It is a question as to whether we are going to adopt a flat rate imposing on the small company a tax of 50 per cent, on the medium-sized company 50 per cent, and upon the giant companies making great war profits 50 per cent; that is all there is to this question; and I do not care to take any more time of the Senate.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I want to say but a word. We are told by the Finance Committee that war profits reckoned on the present basis will be substantially $4,000,000,000. We are also told that the average graduated tax it is proposed to impose is 31 per cent, so that it will produce about $1,200,000,000. My proposition is to take 50 per cent of the $4,000,000,000, so as to have $2,000,000,000 excess-profits tax.

It is hard to make the computations under the complicated system of graduated taxes proposed, and anyone who attempts to do it will find that to be so. I do not know but that there may be a corporation that would pay a little less under the 60 per cent rate; but it seems to me that there would be very few, and nothing has been pointed out to me that satisfies me that it is so. The tax would be on the profits over 300 per cent beyond the exemption. When you get up there you can not expect to do equal and exact justice. We would raise about $700,000,000 more on this 50 per cent flat rate than we would under the committee's recommendation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, before we vote on this question I think we ought to understand another effect of the flat rate. This is something, I think, which has not been considered so far as I have heard in any of the arguments delivered.

There has been a great deal of complaint because the committee saw fit to follow the advice of the Senate and the advice that has been given us so vociferously by the press and adopted in the first instance what those who have argued in the Senate and in the press have declared we should do, namely, levy heavy taxes upon war profits. We levied heavy taxes upon war profits in conformity with the expression throughout the entire country. None of us believed for a single moment that we could levy a tax on war profits that could by any means be tortured into anything that was equal and just, but that was the demand—not that we should levy a tax upon the profits of the corporations, because the idea was to levy the profits tax on the individuals—that we should levy a war-profits tax. We levied that war-profits tax; we knew that it was not equal and could not be made equal; but there were many good reasons why we should hold fast to the war-profits plan and not make an assessment generally upon all of the profits of a corporation.

Now, let me take an illustration and I will show in just a moment that we are jumping from the frying pan into the fire, so far as inequalities are concerned. The moment that we abandoned the war-profits scheme and entered upon the scheme of a tax upon all profits that moment we entered into the field of double taxation. Whenever a corporation makes any sum as profit that profit belongs to the holders of the stock in the corporation, just exactly as it would belong to the members of a partnership.

Now, what is the result? Let me take one of the illustrations which we have had before us day after day. Here is a corporation that earns $20,000,000. Who owns that $20,000,000? Probably the first $10,000,000 would be owned by the 10 heavy stockholders. They would get $1,000,000 each. We could levy a tax against the individual on that million dollars of income.

Who will own the next quarter? It will probably be owned by a thousand individuals who will own $5,000 each. Now we can levy a fair tax upon that amount. Who will own the other quarter? Ten thousand people; and those ten thousand people will own only $500 apiece. That $500 is not taxable under the bill; that $500 would not be taxable at all. Here is a widow with five children who gets $500 from this corporation. Under the bill we say, "If your earnings are only $500, you are not to pay a cent to the support of the Government; let those who are earning a thousand dollars or more do that." But under this amendment we immediately step in and by taxing the corporation's earnings take $250 out of this widow's earnings, out of that which belongs to her. We make her, receiving an income of only $500, pay 50 per cent. You take another individual who earns $1,000, and you make him pay but 1 per cent—50 per cent in one case and 1 per cent in the other.

Mr. President, while in these great institutions the bulk of the stock may be owned by a very few persons, and their earnings could well be taxed, it is equally true that a vast number of people own small holdings of stock, people whose earnings would not pay a penny of income tax; and yet by this scheme of taxation we succeed in levying against the corporations and thereby indirectly against the owner of the small amount of stock a tax of 50 per cent on their earnings. That is the result of our abandoning the war-profits scheme and adopting a scheme that taxes heavily the corporate earnings and then again taxes the same sum when it goes into the hands of the individual. Both schemes are unequal; neither of them can be made just; but, I insist, a better method would have been, first, to levy a heavy tax upon immense incomes, a moderate tax upon moderate incomes, a smaller tax upon small incomes, and no tax upon very meager incomes; and then to reach the corporations and tax them, if you saw fit, a reasonable amount upon their profits. Of course, that would come out of all. When I say "a reasonable amount," I mean 2 or 3 or 5 per cent. Then, if the earnings of a corporation were not distributed, it would be perfectly fair to levy a tax upon the undistributed profits; but I insist that by the method that we have now adopted, we are likely to commit a gross wrong against small holders of stock of corporations and business concerns throughout the country.

I hope that the amendment, for that reason, will not be adopted.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the time is very limited, and therefore I shall not address myself even for a moment to the dramatic side of the pending question. I assume that the impelling purpose back of all taxation is a Government need, and I venture to add in that connection that the nation that taxes beyond its need destroys itself.

To me many of the figures given to the Senate are more or less confusing, and I am about ready to agree with the statement that some one made to the effect that almost anything can be proved by figures.

Immediately pertinent to the question, I assume that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has urged his amendment because he believes we are not raising a sufficient sum by war taxation. I think it was the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] this morning who called attention to the fact that we were raising very much less than England. I venture to offer, therefore, Mr. President, some figures from the London Statist on the question of England's financial program and taxation for the war. I think Senators will find them interesting and will find them correct.

England's total expenditures from the 1st of August, 1914, to the 21st day of July, 1915, for all purposes, both war and peace, amounted to $25,440,378,915. If you deduct from that total sum the first three years' expenses of the regular peace establishment, you will have to take out $2,970,000,000. Then deduct further England's loans to her allies and dependencies, amounting up to that time to $5,855,000,000, and then her interest on her war debt of $990,875,865, and you will have a total deduction to take from the total expenditure of three years of $9,815,875,865, leaving the expenditures of England for three years actually devoted to the prosecution of the war $15,624,503,050.

I grant, Mr. President, that the interest charge may be connected with the war. England had a larger interest charge twice over than the United States before the war began; but, mark you, the distinctly war expenditures of England have been in three years something more than fifteen and a half billion dollars.

Now, note the other side. England's total tax revenues for the same period of time have amounted to $6,168,204,905. If you will deduct from that $6,168,204,905 the regular expenses of the peace establishment for the same period, amounting to $2,970,000,000, and deduct the interest on the war debt of $990,875,865, you will find that England has raised for the actual prosecution of the war $2,207,329,040 in three years, while the United States of America, under the provisions of the present bill, will raise for war purposes alone something like two and one-half billion dollars for the year 1918. Therefore, it seems, Mr. President, that the Senate is certainly going the limit of necessary taxation when we put a burden upon the United States of America of more money in one year than England has assessed in three years of actual conflict.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to call attention to the fact that we are obligating our people for almost as much the first year of the war as England obligated her people for during three years, as shown by the figures which the Senator from Ohio himself has presented.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on former votes and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on former votes and vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as previously announced and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the prior roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the junior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I withdraw my vote, as I have a pair with that Senator.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who I see is not present. I understand, however, that if present the Senator from Alabama would vote as I have voted. Therefore I will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—18.

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	King	Myers
Chamberlain	Johnson, S. Dak.	Kirby	Norris
Gronna	Jones, Wash.	La Follette	Thompson
Hollis	Kendrick	McKellar
Husting	Kenyon	McNary

NAYS—52.

Bankhead	Harding	Page	Smith, Ga.
Borah	James	Penrose	Smith, Md.
Brandeggee	Jones, N. Mex.	Pittman	Smith, Mich.
Broussard	Knox	Poinexter	Smoot
Colt	Lewis	Pomerene	Sterling
Curtis	Lodge	Ransdell	Stone
Dillingham	McCumber	Robinson	Tammell
Fernald	Martin	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Nelson	Shafroth	Warren
France	New	Sheppard	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Newlands	Sherman	Weeks
Gerry	Overman	Shields	Williams
Hale	Owen	Simmons	Wolcott

NOT VOTING—26.

Beckham	Goff	Phelan	Tillman
Brady	Gore	Reed	Townsend
Calder	Hardwick	Smith, Ariz.	Underwood
Culberson	Hitchcock	Smith, S. C.	Vardaman
Cummins	Hughes	Sutherland	Walsh
Fall	Kellogg	Swanson
Gallinger	McLean	Thomas

So the amendment of Mr. HOLLIS to the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

RECESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under its previous order the Senate will now stand in recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Thereupon (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m., Tuesday, September 4, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, September 5, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 4, 1917.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art infinite in all Thine attributes, and ever ready to bestow gifts upon Thy children, incline our hearts to Thee, open Thou our understanding, that we may perceive readily, and faithfully and efficiently fulfill all the duties Thou hast laid upon us. Hear us when we commend the President of the United States and all others in authority throughout our land, especially when we commend our soldiers and sailors who have been called to the colors in this hour of distress. Grant success to their arms in conjunction with our allies, that peace and prosperity may once more smile upon us; and Thine be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 1, 1917, was read and approved.

DEFECTIVE AMMUNITION.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a short resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 132.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to place before this House, within the shortest possible time, all evidence and information he may possess regarding the defective ammunition that has been sent by this Government to the United States expeditionary forces now in Europe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Record.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the Record. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state upon what topic?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes. There seems to have arisen in some quarters a question as to what is the Capital of the United States. Upon that subject I desire to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL BONDS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5901.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will take the chair.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I am not very well, and I would like to be excused.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair will appoint the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CARSP].

Mr. STAFFORD. He is a member of the committee, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the committee which presents this bill.

The SPEAKER. Then we had better excuse you, because somebody might criticize the appointment. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for one hour.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from North Carolina begins I should like to ask him a question for my own information and for the information of other Members of the House. At what time does the gentleman from North Carolina expect to move that the committee rise this afternoon?

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that the parade is at 4 o'clock, and I will certainly move that the committee rise before half past 3.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The committee will rise then before half past 3?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Before I proceed I will suggest that we run along with the general debate, and that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] control half the time and I will control the other half.

Mr. FORDNEY. Would it not be better to have an agreement that the time be equally divided?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will just have that understood.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, he is only entitled to one hour in his own right and can only obtain additional time by unanimous consent.

Mr. KITCHIN. I understand that, but we will just have a gentleman's agreement. We might have made the agreement before we entered the committee, but I knew we could get along without it.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is to be understood that the gentleman is to control half the time on one side and myself half the time on the other side, so that we can apportion the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. We will have that as a gentleman's agreement; yes. We should have made the agreement before we entered the committee, but we will have that understood. We will arrange it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I trust the committee will bear with me without interruption for about 15 minutes, so that I can explain generally the features of this bill.

The Ways and Means Committee present this morning another bill authorizing a tremendous issue of bonds. It provides for an authorization of a bond issue amounting to $7,538,945,460.

Five hundred and thirty-eight million nine hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, included in this, has already been authorized in the act of April 24, 1917, and several preceding acts for reimbursing the Treasury for the expenditure incident to the Mexican situation, the Alaskan railway, the appropriations for the Shipping Board, the nitrate plant, purchase of Danish West Indies, expedition of naval construction, refunding the 3 per cent bonds maturing August, 1918, and the Panama Canal bonds.

By the act of April 24, 1917, we authorized $5,000,000,000, the proceeds of which to the amount of $3,000,000,000 were to be loaned to the allies and $2,000,000,000 were to be expended to help defray the expenses of our Government. Under that authorization the Secretary of the Treasury has offered for subscription and there have been subscribed $2,000,000,000, leaving $3,000,000,000 authorized under the act of April 24, 1917. We have merged that authorization of $3,000,000,000 into this bill; that is, no further bonds will be sold under that act, but the $3,000,000,000 authorized by it and unsold will be issued and sold under this bill. So that the total new or increased authorization in this bill, instead of being $7,538,945,460, is really $4,000,000,000, because of this amount the sum of $3,538,945,460 has already been authorized, but merged into this bill, as I have explained.

This extra authorization of $4,000,000,000 is to enable the United States to make loans to the allies within this current fiscal year. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that it will take at least $500,000,000 a month for the remainder of this fiscal year to supply the absolute necessities of the allies with respect to loans from this Government. The $3,000,000,000 appropriated by the act of April 24, 1917, for such loans will be exhausted by November 1, this year, leaving eight months of the current fiscal year. So, therefore, we authorize by this bill a new or increased bond issue of $4,000,000,000 to meet this monthly demand. This will make a total of $7,000,000,000 which, up to the end of this fiscal year, our Government proposes to loan the allies.

The Secretary of the Treasury, under the pending bill, is authorized to buy at par the obligations of the respective countries to which we make the loan, such obligations or bonds to bear the same rate of interest and to have a maturity not later than the bonds of the United States which we issue to get the proceeds to purchase such foreign obligations. This is principally the way the loans will be made.

We also provide that the Secretary shall put it into the bonds that if hereafter during this war the United States Government shall issue bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than the bonds which we buy of the foreign Governments, that the foreign Governments must convert those bonds into bonds bearing a rate of interest not less than that which the United States bonds bear and shall have a maturity not later than the bonds of the United States.

So, therefore, while we incur a liability or make a public indebtedness of $7,000,000,000 on account of the allies, that $7,000,000,000 is offset by $7,000,000,000 of bonds which we get from the allies bearing a rate of interest not less than and maturing not later than the United States bonds, the interest to be payable at the same time.

In addition to this authorization of bonds, the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certificates of indebtedness to the amount of $4,000,000,000, payable within one year, but not more than $4,000,000,000 shall be outstanding at any one time. Under the present act of April 24, 1917, the Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to issue $2,000,000,000 of these certificates of indebtedness. We make it $4,000,000,000 instead of $2,000,000,000. Gentlemen will realize the necessity of this because before we can possibly sell our bonds and before we can get the taxes which are to be raised under the new revenue bill we must have ready money to meet the expenditures of our own Government. Therefore, it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that we should increase this authorization to $4,000,000,000.

We further provide for $2,000,000,000 of war-savings certificates. This is a new feature or project in this country. In my judgment there is no feature of the bill that will be more practical and no plan suggested by which we could more easily get a billion and a half or two billion dollars from the people of small means and income. The plan is for the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a book, say, of $4 in stamps, which a person can buy, the stamps to be canceled as paid for. When he pays for as many as $4 a certificate for $5 will be issued, payable without interest, five years after date.

It is estimated—and we believe the estimate is correct—that we will get from one to two billion dollars in this way that otherwise would not be invested in bonds; and, too, this will, we believe, inculcate a greater spirit among the people for savings and economy. The certificates are not to run exceeding five years, and the interest is to be discounted in advance. Instead of $4, as I illustrated, it will be about $4.12 that one will pay for the $5 certificate. The amount of such certificates sold to any one person at any one time is not to exceed $100, and no one person will be permitted to own more than $1,000 of them at any one time.

To pay the expenses of selling and issuing the bonds and war-savings certificates an amount not to exceed one-seventh of 1 per cent of the amount of such bonds and certificates, and for the certificates of indebtedness an amount not to exceed one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of same is appropriated.

Another feature of the bill is a provision permitting the Auditor and Comptroller of the Treasury, through assistants, to audit the accounts of the Military Establishment and perform other duties of their offices with respect to such Military Establishment in places other than at the seat of government; in other words, to permit the performance of such duties in foreign lands. Since we are going to send armies to Europe, the necessity for this is apparent to all.

We have already granted credits to our allies as follows:

Great Britain, $1,005,000,000; France, $530,000,000; Italy, $200,000,000; Russia, $275,000,000; Belgium, $53,400,000; Serbia, $3,000,000; a total of $2,066,400,000.

On these credits the actual loans made are as follows:

Great Britain, $970,000,000, leaving $35,000,000 more to loan her in accordance with the credit established; France, $490,000,000, leaving $40,000,000; Italy, $150,000,000, leaving $50,000,000; Russia, $87,500,000, leaving $187,500,000; Belgium, $32,000,000, leaving $21,400,000; Serbia, $1,000,000, leaving $2,000,000.

Gentlemen, the real proposition before the House is, Shall we make an additional loan of $4,000,000,000 to the allies?

If we do, or if we ought to do it—and I think we ought, and it was the unanimous opinion of the committee that it should be done, and the administration is of the same opinion—the issuance of bonds provided for in the bill is the only way it can be done. Even if the country's resources justified such a high amount of taxes in addition to the amount necessary for our own expenditures—and they do not—we could not possibly raise this amount of taxes in time to extend the loan. We are thus confronted with the situation. We are in this war. The allies are fighting the same battles we are fighting, and we have made their cause our cause. Every dollar they expend now is expended for the benefit of us, and every dollar we expend or shall expend will be for the benefit of them. They are not able to finance completely the further prosecution of the war. So far we are able to offer financial help. The administration says this loan is absolutely necessary for the proper and vigorous prosecution of the war by the allies. We are right up against it. Shall we make the loan and help them, or shall we refuse to make the loan and not help them? There can be no question in the mind of any man either in the House or elsewhere but that the United States is fixedly determined to fight this war out side by side with the allies to a triumphant finish. This loan should be made. The bonds provided for in the bill should be issued and sold at the earliest moment. I trust—I ask that not a vote be cast against this bill.

I want to call the attention of the committee to the expenditures of this Government and the appropriations that we have already made and the appropriations contemplated being made for this fiscal year.

It may alarm you. The figures are big and staggering, and yet they are necessary. The appropriations already made amount to $9,114,433,000. The contemplated appropriations for this fiscal year are $9,891,150,000, making a total of $19,005,583,000. In this, understand, is included the $7,000,000,000 loaned and authorized to be loaned to the allies; $325,000,000 for post-office expenses, which will be reimbursed by post-office receipts; and $60,000,000 sinking fund, which is simply a matter, well known to the House, of bookkeeping account. According to our figures, $11,620,000,000 will be required for our expenditures. The Secretary of the Treasury said to the committee that after deducting the amounts I have just mentioned, he estimated that it would require $11,782,000,000, in round numbers, instead of $11,620,000,000 as we calculated. Now, to show what we must provide for in the future, we must deduct from $11,782,000,000 the proceeds of $2,000,000,000 of bonds already issued or subscribed for under the act of April 24, 1917. We should also deduct $1,333,500,000, being the estimate of revenues we will receive this fiscal year under existing taxation laws.

This will leave $8,448,500,000. The pending revenue bill will possibly levy as much as $2,500,000,000 when it becomes a law. I believe it ought to carry at least that much to help meet the new demands and new expenditures made and contemplated since the bill passed the House. Deducting that will leave $5,948,500,000. Suppose we get $1,000,000,000 from the war-saving certificates during this fiscal year, and I believe we may get that much. Deduct this from the $5,948,500,000, and it will leave $4,948,500,000, or in round numbers $5,000,000,000, which we must hereafter raise to defray our expenditures for this fiscal year. This can be done only by new taxation and new bonds. It is therefore evident that additional revenue legislation will be necessary at the regular session to meet the total expenditures for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. To give you some idea of how rapidly the situation and conditions are changing and of how rapid and enormous the new demands not heretofore contemplated are, I remind you that when we presented the revenue bill in May the total contemplated extra expenditures on account of the war were $3,800,000,000. We provided for that amount first by the $2,000,000,000 authorization of bonds in the act of April 24, 1917, and, second, by the revenue bill now pending in the Senate, which passed the House, raising the balance of $1,800,000,000. Now, in addition to that, and within less time than three months, so great and so many have the new demands been that we will have to raise at least $5,000,000,000 more, nearly twice as much as was provided in the bond bill and in the revenue bill, to meet our own expenditures.

Gentlemen, I have given you a bird's-eye view of the principal features of this bill, and if any gentleman desires to ask any question as to any particular feature of it I will be very glad to answer.

Mr. SIMS. What rate of interest will the $4,000,000,000 war certificates of indebtedness bear?

Mr. KITCHIN. In the act of April 24 we provided that the rate should not exceed  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. In this bill we provide no limit as to the rate of interest to be paid on the certificates of indebtedness. The more bonds we put on the market and the more taxes we raise the greater is the demand for money. During the crop-moving season more money is required by the public than at other times. The Secretary of the Treasury in some months can borrow money for  $2\frac{1}{2}$  or 3 per cent, sometimes at 2 per cent, but at certain times of the year—and it may be at a time when the Government is in most need of funds—the money market may become tight, money may be worth more than  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. We did not wish to tie the hands of the Government by limiting the interest rate so it could not get the money on these short-time certificates—none to exceed a year—when its needs were urgent. Possibly sometimes the rate may go to 4 per cent. The last money borrowed on the certificates of indebtedness the Secretary had to pay  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent; the first only 2 per cent. Since the crops are being moved, perhaps in September, October, and November short-time certificates for 60 or 90 days may probably have to bear over  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. We can easily conceive of circumstances under which such short-time certificates may have to bear even more than 4 per cent.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the European allies felt themselves incapable of prosecuting the war financially further?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. What I meant was that it would be very difficult for them to do it, and they could not as vigorously prosecute the war as they should and as they desire without great embarrassment and hardship unless we extended to them the loan or credit provided in the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Is it a fact that the combined wealth of the European allies—Great Britain, France, Russia, and Italy—is considerably larger than that of the central powers?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. Why is it, then, that they can not continue, while Germany and Austria can?

Mr. KITCHIN. I can not answer that. I expect every man, woman, and child in the allied countries and in this country has asked that question. I will say to the gentleman that it is estimated that Germany has a bonded indebtedness in the neighborhood of $20,000,000,000 owing to the war; Austria about $8,000,000,000. On March 31, 1917, Great Britain's bonded indebtedness was about $18,000,000,000, less $3,000,000,000 they had before the war, or about $15,000,000,000 on account of the war.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think they stated it was $15,000,000,000, about, last March.

Mr. KITCHIN. I said March 31. France, on account of war expenditures, has an indebtedness of about $12,000,000,000; Russia about $9,000,000,000; Italy about $4,000,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER of New York. If the allies could not, on account of lack of resources, continue this, how could Germany do it when Germany is in a worse fix financially than the allies?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know. While the public indebtedness of the allies on account of this war is about $40,000,000,000, Germany's indebtedness, including the various States of the Empire, is about $20,000,000,000.

That same kind of a question was asked during the Civil War. Why is it, asked men, like the gentleman from New York, with the North having so many more resources, having all the necessary facilities to carry on the war, having so much larger population and wealth, the South continues the struggle? That question has been asked with respect to every country in every war the world has ever had. We know they are doing it, and by this very bill we are trying to assist the allies to prevent Germany holding out longer.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. WALSH. To what tax is it proposed to make the interest on these bonds subject? You say "commonly called surtaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes;" will they not be subject simply to the income taxes of the war-revenue bill now pending?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. The interest on the proposed bonds will not be subject to the normal tax of existing law or of any act hereafter passed by Congress, but it will be subject to the State and Federal estate or inheritance tax, as are the bonds authorized by act of April 24, 1917, and also to the Federal graduated "additional tax" on incomes, so called by the present act, and by the pending revenue bill commonly known as surtaxes and the excess-profits or war-profits tax. As to all other taxes—Federal, State, county, and municipal—the interest on the bonds is exempt.

This bill does not impose any tax upon such interest. It simply makes the interest subject to such taxes as I have mentioned, if Congress hereafter sees fit to impose them on it.

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has referred to the fact that the maximum of interest fixed in the former bill had been reached by the Secretary of the Treasury on these short-time certificates?

Mr. KITCHIN. I said the last certificates of indebtedness carried three and a half.

Mr. GORDON. You started at two. Is it not a fact that the tendency to go to the maximum is very strong?

Mr. KITCHIN. The tighter the money becomes—

Mr. GORDON. The higher the maximum the tighter the money will become.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine the tightness of money would precede—

Mr. GORDON. The gentleman has said that Congress ought to authorize the sale of these certificates at a reasonable rate of interest, and there is no restriction in the bill that it shall be a reasonable rate. It is whatever the Secretary of the Treasury may—

Mr. KITCHIN. The certificates of indebtedness, as the gentleman understands, are for short-time loans, not to run more than one year.

Mr. GORDON. Does not the gentleman think it is an extraordinary power to confer on a Cabinet officer?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. And does the gentleman think it ought to be conferred?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; under the circumstances. I explained a moment ago why we gave it to him in this bill. We can not possibly in any one year avoid borrowing considerable money on short-time certificates, because about $2,000,000,000 of our taxes will be paid—

Mr. GORDON. I understand the reason for the certificates; but about the rate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose money should be tight, say, in October, November, and December—

Mr. GORDON. It will be if you leave the lid off.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the market value of money for short-time loans is over  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, or even over 4 per cent, and the Government at the time is in urgent need of funds to meet for the time being its necessary expenditures on account of the war, what could the Secretary do—what could the Government do—if the statute fixed a limit to the interest rate within which he could not borrow?

Suppose the limit was  $3\frac{1}{2}$  and he could not borrow the needed money for less than 4 per cent. Then what must he do?

Mr. GORDON. He must go to Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. Call an extra session to give him that power?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. We believed that we had better give him that power now.

Mr. GORDON. Suppose money gets so tight that he would have to pay even 10 per cent. What would happen to you if he did that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I do not think one should consider what would happen to him individually in legislating in this great crisis.

Mr. GORDON. I mean what would happen to the reputation of this House if that situation should result?

Mr. KITCHIN. If while engaged in this war it became impossible to get money without paying 10 per cent, we would have to pay it or surrender.

Mr. GORDON. Do you not think Congress ought to be called in extra session in such an exigency as that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly an extra session would have to be called if you made by this bill the limit to the interest rate so low that the Secretary could borrow no money. I think it is an extraordinary power that should be considered very carefully, and we did so consider it.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Will these United States bonds, principal and interest, and these certificates issued by this bill, be subject to State, county, and municipal taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; only to the estate and inheritance taxes. Of course, they would be subject to the inheritance taxes of the States, and so are the bonds authorized by the act of April 24, 1917. As to all other taxes—Federal, State, county, and municipal—the bonds, principal and interest, are exempt, except the interest is subject to the graduated additional tax on incomes or, as they are called, the surtaxes and to the excess-profits or war-profits tax.

Mr. SIMS. But that would apply only to Federal taxes?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; only to the Federal surtax and the excess-profits or war-profits taxes.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GREGG. What is the surtax?

Mr. KITCHIN. The additional tax, so called by the statute. Under the present law the normal tax, so called by the act, is 2 per cent. In the pending revenue bill we have increased that to 4 per cent. Under the present law, on a married man's income in excess of $20,000, and not in excess of $40,000, there is the additional 1 per cent tax.

On the income in excess of $40,000 and not in excess of $60,000, there is a 2 per cent tax, and so forth. In the pending revenue bill, when the income is over $4,000 the normal tax is 4 per cent, and we begin the surtaxes or additional tax at $5,000. All of the income in excess of $5,000 and not in excess of $7,500 pays an additional tax of 1 per cent. All in excess of $7,500 and not exceeding $10,000 pays 2 per cent additional, and so forth. The graduated taxes, in excess of the straight flat normal taxes, are commonly known as surtaxes or surtaxes. They are called "surtaxes" in Great Britain. Our statute calls them "additional" taxes.

Mr. KITCHIN. When these bonds are issued they will be subject, first, to the estate or inheritance tax, and, second, the interest on them subject to the surtax or additional tax, as I explained; and the excess-profits or war-profits taxes. Congress can do that in the future. That is the reason we increased the rate from  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent, as provided in the act of April 24, 1917, to 4 per cent. We were convinced, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the experts of the Treasury and others outside of the Treasury Department that helped sell the \$2,000,000,000 bonds a few months ago, are convinced that we could more easily sell the bonds and they would be taken more generally by the people with this 4 per cent rate, but subject to the surtaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes, than would a  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bond exempt from such taxes.

While we recognize that the wealthy people who must pay heavy surtaxes will not take as many of these bonds, subject to the surtax, as they would  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bonds exempt from such tax, what we will lose from this source we will more than make up from the thousands and millions of people whose incomes are not large enough to incur a heavy surtax or any surtax. In the last issue of bonds over 50 per cent—largely over 50 per cent—of the subscriptions was made by parties who paid no surtaxes, and, in fact, the average amount of bonds taken by subscribers was a little less than \$500 each. It was the people of small or moderate incomes that largely subscribed and oversubscribed to those bonds.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. The gentleman speaks of the surtax applying to these bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Applying to the interest only, if Congress shall see fit hereafter to impose such tax on the interest.

Mr. BATHRICK. Do you mean by surtax all tax above the old limit of $3,000 and $4,000?

Mr. KITCHIN. All income taxes other than the normal. You will understand that under the income tax now and the provisions of the income tax in the pending revenue bill a distinction is made between the "normal tax" and "the additional tax." One is called a normal tax, as I explained to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] a while ago. Under the present law a person receiving an income over $4,000, if married, and if single a person receiving $3,000, and all the way through, big and little, pay the normal tax of 2 per cent. We have increased that tax to 4 per cent in the pending revenue bill. The Senate has put on an amendment increasing the rate for corporations to 6 per cent instead of 4 per cent, as the House had it. The interest on the bonds will be exempt from this or any other normal tax Congress may impose, but will be subject to the graduated additional tax or surtax if Congress should impose such on the interest.

Mr. BATHRICK. One question more.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. This surtax as now proposed is an emergency measure, is it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. The pending bill is a war measure; yes.

Mr. BATHRICK. And after the war the surtax will be abandoned, will it not?

Mr. KITCHIN. We had the surtax before the war, in the revenue acts of 1913 and of 1916, but not near so high as that in the pending revenue bill. We presented that bill with the idea that it was to be a strictly war measure, and it would be repealed upon the termination of the war or within a short time thereafter. It is strictly a war measure—to raise revenue to defray our war expenses. When we first introduced that bill and passed it in this House, it was presumed that when the war ended there would be no longer any necessity for these taxes. But we are now undeceived—I suppose everybody is—and we know that long, long after the war there will be high taxes on incomes, and large surtaxes on large incomes, and taxes on excess profits, much in excess of the existing revenue acts but not as high as in the pending revenue bill.

Mr. BATHRICK. What I was trying to ask the gentleman was, if after the war, the emergency having passed, the surtax being decreased, that possible conditions might not have an important bearing on the rate of interest on these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the bonds may not be subject to high surtaxes.

Mr. BATHRICK. Therefore, in view of such possibility, it is not necessary to make the rate of interest on these bonds so high now, is it?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it is. For instance, take a man with an income of \$1,000,000. With the surtaxes proposed in the pending revenue bill as it passed the House a bond bearing  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent interest, subject to no surtaxes, is equal to an investment bearing 8.75 per cent to that man. You can figure that out. So to a man with an income of \$500,000 it would be equivalent to an investment of 7.82 per cent. Of course, a 4 per cent bond subject to a surtax is nothing like as good an investment for him as a  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bond exempt from such tax, and the Government will get nothing like as much money from him if he should buy such a  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent bond. It would lose the surtax on his income. It is our belief that it is better for all the people to take these bonds than to have them taken by just a group of wealthy men, who in years past have taken most of the bonds. When you balance accounts up and take both sides I believe the gentleman will agree with us that it is better for the people generally, of more modest incomes, incomes of from \$1,000 up to \$100,000, to take these bonds at 4 per cent subject to the surtax rather than to have men with incomes amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars or millions of dollars take or afterwards get practically all at  $3\frac{1}{2}$  per cent exempt from the surtax.

Mr. BATHRICK. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. TOWNER. How much longer does the gentleman think this side of the House ought to wait before having the opportunity to have questions answered?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will answer any questions that anybody on either side may ask me. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that he should take it as a great compliment to his side of the House that it has not asked many or any questions, because it shows that it understood the subject anyway without asking questions. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNER. I might suggest something that you may have omitted.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. As I understand from the report of the committee, there is about $1,000,000,000 unexpended of the amount already authorized.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman means $1,000,000,000 of the $3,000,000,000 appropriated for loan to the allies by act of April 24, 1917.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. Of that which has been promised to them, or as is stated here, loans and credits agreed upon, there is approximately $335,900,000 unexpended.

Mr. KITCHIN. But already agreed to be loaned.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but certainly there is an amount of $187,500,000 authorized to be loaned to Russia. Is it expected that that will now be paid to Russia under existing circumstances?

Mr. KITCHIN. Really that is rather a delicate question for us to discuss here, but I will say to the gentleman that under all the circumstances we can afford to take the chance, and I think we had better leave that to the administration.

Mr. TOWNER. At least in any event there is $1,300,000,000 that is now available?

Mr. KITCHIN. That amount has already been appropriated.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. But we have not the money now for the full amount of appropriation.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly, but we do not need to issue bonds for that amount, at least at the present time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; we do.

Mr. TOWNER. We have already issued the bonds for that.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we have already offered and had subscribed for and are now issuing $2,000,000,000 of bonds—

Mr. TOWNER. Authorized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get that "authorized" clear in the gentleman's mind. On April 24, 1917, we authorized $5,000,000,000 of bonds, the proceeds from $3,000,000,000 to be loaned to the allies, and in that act we appropriated that amount for the loan. Of that $5,000,000,000 the proceeds of $2,000,000,000 bonds were to go to meet our expenditures. Now we have sold and are now issuing $2,000,000,000, leaving $3,000,000,000 of bonds which we have merged into this authorization. It makes no difference whether we say that $2,000,000,000 were sold to meet our expenditures or to meet that much of the $3,000,000,000 appropriated for loan to the allies.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly we do not need, however, to authorize the issuance now to the extent of that $1,300,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman has the amount of the appropriation mixed up with the amount of money we have to pay that appropriation. We have not the money to pay the total appropriation. We present this bill to get the money.

Mr. TOWNER. No—

Mr. KITCHIN. Wait a minute. We appropriated $3,000,000,000 to loan to the allies. Now we have loaned them how much?

Mr. TOWNER. Approximately $2,000,000,000.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, that is the appropriation; but we have not the money for that $3,000,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. You are authorizing an additional issue of bonds in this bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of $4,000,000,000 to be loaned to the allies, in addition to the $3,000,000,000 appropriated by the act of April 24, 1917, making a total of $7,000,000,000 loaned and to be loaned during this fiscal year to the allies. We also authorized by that act, in addition to this $3,000,000,000, $2,000,000,000 to help meet our own expenditures. We have sold only $2,000,000,000, leaving $3,000,000,000 under that act to be sold, which $3,000,000,000 we have merged into the pending bill, and instead of selling under the April 24, 1917, act we propose to sell under this bill. Adding this to the $4,000,000,000 additional loan we propose to make makes $7,000,000,000 in all. To meet this $7,000,000,000 and the $2,000,000,000 provided for in the act of April 24, 1917, to help meet our expenditures, totaling $9,000,000,000, we have only $2,000,000,000 in money, proceeds of sale of last bonds. To meet the balance of $7,000,000,000 required we propose this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Why is it necessary at this time, when we have available bonds already authorized?

Mr. KITCHIN. I thought the gentleman was here when I began my remarks. Those bonds authorized, as I have explained, are merged into this bill. The gentleman will find it in section 11, which says that no other bonds shall be issued under the act of April 24, 1917, but the bonds therein authorized and not yet offered for sale, amounting to $3,000,000,000, will be sold and issued under this bill.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Does not he think that we might fairly wait until December before we authorize the issuance of any more bonds to the allies?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Secretary of the Treasury told us—I think it is in his printed testimony—that they will require at least $500,000,000 a month for the remainder of this fiscal year.

The $3,000,000,000 appropriated for the loan to the allies under the act of April 24 will be expended by November 1. It will take during the balance of the fiscal year after November 1 $500,000,000 a month, making $4,000,000,000. We must authorize the issuance of bonds in advance, because it will take a considerable time to sell these bonds or to sell any amount of bonds as large as this. So that we have to authorize the issuance of the bonds many months ahead.

Mr. TOWNER. Is it the idea of the Secretary of the Treasury that it would be better done at this time than later?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and the reason of that is this: The allies must know several months in advance what they can depend upon, in order to prepare months ahead for future military campaigns.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman is making only the interest on the bonds subject to certain taxes, and not the bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; the interest on the bonds will be subject to certain taxes which I mentioned a few moments ago.

Mr. SIMS. I desire to ask the gentleman in regard to these small certificates of indebtedness running for five years which I think will be very popular—

Mr. KITCHIN. War-savings certificates.

Mr. SIMS. What I want to ask is this: When these certificates mature at the end of the five years, are they to be redeemed in cash or are they convertible into bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. They could, according to the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into bonds or be redeemed before or at that time.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman said something about converting them into $100 bonds in his opening statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the plan. We do not provide the plan in the bill, but simply give the Secretary power to issue these war certificates and make arrangements to redeem them before or discount—

Mr. SIMS. After maturity what rate of interest will they bear if not paid off or exchanged for bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. They will have to be paid off at maturity or exchanged for bonds. If exchanged for bonds, the interest provided in this bill would be not to exceed 4 per cent.

Mr. SIMS. Four per cent.

Mr. OSBORNE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Speaking of the greater cost in men and money to the allies in the present war compared with Germany and of the greater cost to the Union during the Civil War compared with the Confederacy, is it not apparent that powers in war fighting on interior lines and largely defensive always do so at a less cost than those who fight on exterior lines and in an offensive warfare?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. OSBORNE. A further question: Is it not a fact that Germany has expended $20,000,000 since the beginning of the war, while the allies have expended a much larger sum, due largely to the fact that Germany has been preparing for this war for more than 40 years and that its expenditures for armament and preparation, which have during that time been covered by current taxation, have been very great and are not given in the comparison?

Mr. KITCHIN. I presume the gentleman is right, certainly in the main.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. GILLETT. Can the gentleman tell us, if it is proper to divulge it, about how much of the money that has already been loaned to the allies has been expended in this country?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am informed that by far a larger part—75 or 80 per cent. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to this. Of this $4,000,000,000 extra we are going to loan them in addition to the $3,000,000,000 authorized, I would say not less than 75 per cent would be expended in this country.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. KEATING. As I understood the gentleman, the object in increasing the interest rate on the bonds from 3½ to 4 per cent was because the committee had in mind the taxation of the bonds. Why did not the committee make the bonds subject to this surtax and excise tax?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because this is a bond bill and not a tax bill. It will be suggested to the Senate that a provision should be put into the revenue bill now pending before it subjecting these bonds to the surtaxes, excess-profits, and war-profits tax.

Mr. KEATING. But the gentleman here is defining the terms of the bond.

Mr. KITCHIN. The interest on these bonds will be subject to whatever surtax, excess-profits, or war-profits tax the Congress may now or hereafter impose on it. I will say to the gentleman, should I be on the conference committee, we are going to try to arrange it in conference.

Mr. KEATING. I hope the gentleman will succeed in getting that provision in the bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say that I will try to do my best.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. I want to ask the gentleman—he has spoken of the advances made to the allied Governments—do I understand when this country places to the credit of one of the allied nations, for instance, the sum of $1,000,000, that that nation deposits interest-bearing bonds of that particular country with the United States at the time?

Mr. KITCHIN. It deposits with the Secretary of the Treasury its short-time interest-bearing obligation—I believe a demand obligation. That will be converted into long-time bonds later.

Mr. JUUL. Practically the amount which this Nation will pay in interest on these bonds will be covered by a similar interest on the part of the allied nations?

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman is correct. The interest on one will offset the other.

Mr. JUUL. That part of the interest will be paid by nations that will be able to pay?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; those nations able to pay.

Mr. JUUL. What part of the proceeds will be deposited in the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. If the Secretary of the Treasury, with the President's approval, loaned Great Britain $100,000,000 to-day, the ambassador is fully authorized, according to the statement of the Secretary of State, to bind his Government and give the United States its short-time obligations, drawing interest for the time, the same rate of interest we pay at the particular time. These will be later converted into long-time bonds, maturing not later than the United States bonds, and bearing a rate of interest as high as the bonds issued under this act.

Mr. JUUL. May I be permitted to ask the gentleman if it has ever been estimated what percentage of the total bonds issued by this country for the benefit of the allies would be equal to ours in standard value?

Mr. KITCHIN. At present? You mean whether the bonds of the allies taken by the United States at par are worth less than par?

Mr. JUUL. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say they would be somewhat below par. They would be less than the face value. Unless they become bankrupt, if we keep the bonds until maturity we will get every dollar back and the interest. The interest will be payable at the same time interest on our bonds are payable.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Did the committee ascertain how much of the original loan that we made the allies was paid to the bonding houses of the United States for advance credits before this loan was made?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have no information on that subject.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It has been stated that more than $400,000,000 of this first loan was paid directly by the Treasury of the United States to certain bonding houses of the United States for credits they had advanced to the allies before these loans were made.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know the facts about that; but suppose it had been so, that would be helping the allies just as effectually.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wanted to know whether or not that was a fact.

Mr. KITCHIN. I really do not know.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman's question prompts me to make this inquiry. The question was raised as to the market value of the securities of these countries. My understanding has been—and I am asking the gentleman from North Carolina if it is correct—that we are proceeding to this transaction upon the theory that their bonds will be worth their face value, are we not?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think we could proceed upon the theory that they are now worth their face value—

Mr. SLAYDEN. So far as the effect of this transaction is concerned?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. We take them at par. Unless they become bankrupt, as I said, which I do not think they will, and we hold the bonds until maturity, we will get every dollar of the bonds.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is a financial transaction, and the thing will be for us to get money from our own people and pay the securities.

Mr. WALSH. What is the reason for increasing the appropriation for expenses from one-tenth of 1 per cent to one-seventh of 1 per cent for these bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. We sold $2,000,000,000 at a cost of two and one-half million dollars, but, as the gentleman understands, the more bonds we sell the harder it will be to sell the next issue, and the next issue, and it will be a larger and a more expensive campaign to sell each new issue than the preceding issue. We have sold $2,000,000,000 worth. I think the Secretary said it cost about two and one-half millions. Five billion dollars may be put in the next issue for sale. The gentleman will understand that it will cost a great deal more; that there will be larger operating expenses under a campaign to sell $5,000,000,000 than under the $2,000,000,000 campaign. Perhaps two or three campaigns to sell the $7,000,000,000 of bonds will have to be made.

Mr. MADDEN. I see that the bill provides granting authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the bonds of the allied nations if he thinks proper at any time before maturity at such prices as he may be able to obtain for them?

Mr. KITCHIN. At such prices as we paid for them.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, no. He recommends in his testimony—

Mr. KITCHIN. He did recommend that, but the committee thought best to put a limit on it, and so the bill provides they must receive for the bonds, when he sells them, a price not less than we paid for them, with all accrued interest.

Mr. MADDEN. But the Secretary of the Treasury, however, did suggest that he be permitted to sell the bonds at any price he chose if he thought it was wise to do it?

Mr. KITCHIN. He gave good reasons to the committee why that would be wise, but the committee, after weighing the reasons for and against such a provision, decided to put the provision in the bill as it is. If it should become necessary to sell the bonds at less than par, Congress could authorize it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to continue until he completes his statement.

Mr. KITCHIN. Say five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed indefinitely. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I should object to that, but I have no objection to his taking an hour if he needs it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Put it 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. I see that the Secretary of the Treasury recommends, and I think the committee also, that the Secretary be allowed to pay any interest rate he chooses on the certificates of indebtedness he may issue. I suppose the gentleman has answered that question, but there should be a limit on that, it seems to me, not to exceed 4 per cent.

Mr. KITCHIN. We felt that sometimes at certain periods in the year, when the Government was in urgent need of funds, money could not be borrowed at that rate, and that we ought not to tie the hands of the Secretary nor of the Government with respect to the short-time—not exceeding a year—certificates of indebtedness. While money may be very hard to get for two or three months in a year and the Government may possibly have to pay 4 per cent or more, I am confident, and I believe the gentleman will agree with me, that during the whole year it will not average more than 3½ per cent, and probably not that much.

Mr. MADDEN. Did the Secretary of the Treasury estimate the value of the bonds that are to be issued under this bill, calculating the surtaxes? That is, did he estimate it after deducting the surtaxes that are proposed to be charged under this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; not that. But we did have estimates—some of the committee made estimates and the Treasury Department also made estimates—showing the value of these 3½ per cent bonds as an investment to persons who paid large income surtaxes.

Mr. MADDEN. I know about that; but what I want to find out is if anybody knows what the interest rate will be on the 4 per cent bonds when you pay surtax on it?

Mr. KITCHIN. It depends upon the amount of the surtax. It will be on the same basis of calculation as the 3½ per cent; that is, if the surtaxes are what they now are or will be what is proposed in the pending revenue bill, it is a mere matter of calculation.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman from North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, think it is only fair to the public who are going to buy the bonds to tell the public what the value of the interest rate is?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not know what the surtax rate will be. It depends, as the gentleman ought to know, upon the amount of the surtax.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is, Are the bonds to be offered before the surtax is fixed, or afterwards?

Mr. KITCHIN. A part of them will be offered between now and November 1, and a part after that. A man will take the bonds just as the other bonds, subject to the estate and inheritance tax, as Congress may fix it in the future. It will be the same way with respect to the surtaxes. He will take this bond subject to the will of Congress hereafter to impose surtaxes, big or little.

Mr. MADDEN. I should think we were putting out bonds under false pretenses.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. The bill declares that the interest on them shall not be exempt from surtaxes and excess-profits or war-profits taxes now or hereafter imposed by Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. But on the face of the bonds and in the bill it says they are going to pay 4 per cent interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. Four per cent subject to the estate and inheritance taxes imposed by the United States and by the States, and also subject to such surtaxes or excess-profits taxes or war-profit taxes as Congress now imposes or may hereafter impose.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman answer this question: Would that be more or less than 3½ per cent?

Mr. KITCHIN. We can not tell until we know what the amount of the surtaxes will be.

Mr. MADDEN. Is not that false pretense?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no. Was it false pretense to sell as the Secretary of the Treasury did sell a few months ago the $2,000,000 bonds, all subject under the act to estate or inheritance taxes now or hereafter imposed by the United States and the States?

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman said a few moments ago, in response to the query propounded by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUEL], that the foreign bonds we would receive in exchange for our bonds would be taken at par value?

Mr. KITCHIN. At par value.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. At face value?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. In other words, if they give us a $100,000,000 of bonds we give them $100,000,000, although their bonds at the time may not be worth over $95,000,000. They will bear the same rate of interest as our bonds and mature not later than our bonds.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. If these bonds are sold at a discount and are worth 95 per cent on the dollar, the foreign Government will not issue us bonds to the amount of 105 cents on the dollar?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. They will issue them at par. We hold them until maturity, and can not sell them without an act of Congress, according to the provisions of the bill, below the price we paid for them.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The par value and the face value are the same?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I see in the bill that the bonds are to be payable either at a long time or at such time as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, at the option of the Government.

Mr. KITCHIN. Which bonds do you refer to?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The bonds which we issue are to be payable at a long time compulsorily, with the option of the Government to pay at a short time, at such time as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. That is very much like our 5-20 bonds or our 10-30 bonds. I remember very well what advantage it was to the United States to be able to redeem the bonds before maturity and redeem them at a low rate of interest instead of at a high rate, and I ask the gentleman the question whether it ought not to be considered and put into this bill, so that all the bonds may be redeemed, say, after five years, so that the Government could exercise that privilege of borrowing money at a lower rate?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I do not think it could be done here. Ordinarily it would be advisable, but under present circumstances I imagine it would affect the salability of the bonds now.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. May I ask another question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is provided that the rate may rise very considerably. We may have to borrow, as the gentleman said a little while ago, at 6 per cent or 7 per cent or 8 per cent or even at 10 per cent, and if we have to borrow at a higher rate we ought to have the privilege of paying them off at a short term.

Mr. KITCHIN. I referred to the short-time certificates of indebtedness in assuming a rate of interest over 3½ or 4 per cent. I did not say we would have to borrow at 6, 7, 8, or 10 per cent. I think 4 per cent is as high as we will ever pay, on the average, for a year loan. The maturity for the bonds is put in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman, of course, remembers that the short-term bond—the 5 years in the one case, in the 5-20, and the 10 years in the other case, the 10-30—the gentleman remembers that provision was very useful?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I understand that the present plan of the Secretary is to make them redeemable after a certain number of years, optional with the Government; that the $2,000,000,000 bonds recently sold will run from 15 to 30 years, redeemable at the option of the Government after a certain number of years.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to have it limited to five years.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee as to the amount of bonds floated by the allied Governments since the passage of the act of April 24, 1917, when we undertook to carry some of their bonded loans?

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman mean floated here or floated elsewhere?

Mr. STAFFORD. Bond authorizations by the allies to carry on their war, other than their dependence upon us by reason of the $3,000,000,000 authorization carried in the last bond act; and I should like to inquire whether the allied Governments are looking almost exclusively to our Government to carry their bonded indebtedness, or whether they are looking to their own sources for that character of revenue.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman called my attention to that feature. Mr. Bonar Law, minister of finance of Great Britain, made a speech in Parliament, I think in May, in which he said that the expenditures of the British Government would be much more this fiscal year than theretofore, and he estimated that they would be in the neighborhood of $11,150,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. But of that amount how much will be raised by taxation and how much will we furnish in the way of this bonded loan, and how much will they furnish in the way of bonded loan? In other words, are we carrying their entire bond issue?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; of course we are not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Other than that which they issue as security for the loan which we make to them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have Mr. Law's speech here. He says that England's expenditures for this year—that is, her fiscal year ending March, 1918—is estimated at £2,290,381,000, or in our money about $11,150,000,000 in round numbers, and she will raise in taxes £638,600,000, or about $3,000,000,000, leaving a balance to be provided by loan or bonds of £1,651,781,000, or about $8,000,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. But we have already advanced to them $1,000,000,000, and will furnish them more in addition, so that we are furnishing them with a considerable amount of the money which they are obtaining by their bond issues.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman's question was whether we are carrying the whole load or whether Great Britain is—

Mr. STAFFORD. Or what proportion.

Mr. KITCHIN. Instead of our carrying the whole load, Great Britain will raise in taxes, as I said, over $3,000,000,000 and will issue bonds to the amount of about $8,000,000,000. Her total bonded indebtedness on account of the war was, on July 21, 1917, $18,453,867,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Some of this $8,000,000,000 will be turned over to our Government as security for the loans we make to them.

Mr. KITCHIN. And if Great Britain borrows of this future loan fund in proportion to the loan fund authorized by the act of April 24, 1917, she will borrow about $2,000,000,000 of that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman furnish like figures so far as France and Italy are concerned?

Mr. KITCHIN. I see the gentleman has the report of the committee in his hand. Will he turn to the last page?

Mr. STAFFORD. That does not give the information as to how much these respective countries are carrying of their own loans.

Mr. KITCHIN. I was under the impression that it did, but am mistaken.

Mr. STAFFORD. The question was whether the gentleman could give similar figures as to the Governments of France and Italy.

Mr. KITCHIN. The bonded indebtedness of France on account of the war was, on April 30, 1917, $11,379,473,000; that of Italy on January 1, 1917, $3,275,494,000, but now, I understand, about $5,000,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, as I understand the operations so far as loans and credits to the foreign allied Governments are concerned, we have virtually granted all of their requests so far as they have been made.

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say that the President and the Secretary of the Treasury investigated fully into reasons and necessities for each loan before it was made. And then the question of the necessity of this loan and the necessity of their wants and demands must largely be determined by them and not by us.

Mr. STAFFORD. We read in the papers how the Canadian Pacific Railway Co. canceled a very large issue of debentures because the United States Government, under its former bond act was going to carry some of the loans of the British Government, and naturally the British Government is leaning on us to a considerable extent, which they would not otherwise do if we had not passed the prior bond bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman will, of course, not undertake to vouch for the truth of the newspaper stories. Is the gentleman suggesting that we ought not to make loans to Great Britain and the other allies?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; my suggestion is that there should be some board or commission to pass upon the advisability of loaning them these large amounts, rather than to grant everything that they ask.

Mr. KITCHIN. Are not the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Navy a pretty good commission to look into that, compared with parties who have no responsibility in the matter?

Mr. STAFFORD. The testimony shows that the Secretary of the Treasury is the only person who passes on this—vised by the President—and those two officials are so burdened with other cares that they are not in any position to investigate the great questions that are involved as to the extent to which these big loans of billions of dollars should be made to these allied Governments, and whether we are going to get the money back at the end of the war or at some time in the future.

Now I will ask the gentleman another question. Can the gentleman furnish the committee with the expense occasioned by the flotation of the certificates of indebtedness?

Mr. KITCHIN. One-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of such certificates was appropriated by the act of April 24, 1917, for expenses in issuing and selling them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended half an hour.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will ask, Mr. Chairman, for an extension of five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from Wisconsin wants to know what the expense was for the flotation of the certificates of indebtedness. The Treasury Department estimated that it would cost one-tenth of 1 per cent, and Congress appropriated that amount for such purpose.

Mr. STAFFORD. The general information is that in the flotation of the certificates of indebtedness they were taken without much expense, as far as advertising is concerned, the banks having immediately subscribed for the loan. It did not require that much to float the bond loan, and certainly to float the certificates of indebtedness the amount ought not to be as great.

I will repeat the question that I originally put, whether the gentleman has any figures of the actual expense of the flotation of the certificates of indebtedness?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I have not, except, as I say, the Treasury Department estimated that it would cost one-tenth of 1 per cent, and we so provided in the act of April 24, 1917, and the House, including the gentleman, thought it was a reasonable amount, and voted for it without a dissenting vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. But the gentleman has no information as to what it actually cost.

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I have not the figures of the actual expenses incurred in issuing and selling the certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. STAFFORD. One further question and I am done. The committee has raised the amount in this bill that may be authorized for floating the bonds and the war-saving certificates. Now, it did not require one-tenth of 1 per cent to float the bond issue. I can understand how it will require more than one-tenth of 1 per cent if the Secretary is going to advertise for years and years in floating the war-saving certificates. Ought not the allowances to be segregated, say, one amount for the bonds and a larger amount for the war-saving certificates?

Mr. KITCHIN. The committee thought that one-seventh of 1 per cent was sufficient. The department asked for one-fifth of 1 per cent. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that it did not require one-tenth of 1 per cent to float the bond issue. The Secretary of the Treasury testified before the committee that it cost about $2,500,000 to issue and sell the $2,000,000,000 bonds; that is one-eighth of 1 per cent. It cost over $1,000,000 for paper and engraving alone.

Mr. DENISON. But that expense was incurred in getting a subscription for over three billion.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; but as I said to the gentleman from Massachusetts, it will be harder to get subscriptions for the next issue and harder for the next. There will be more work, more agents, more advertising, and, of course, in the conversion of the bonds already prepared there will be extra cost of engraving and for paper.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. Is it not a matter of fact that this issue is to be of a much smaller denomination, and that will increase the cost?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is probable that they will be of smaller denominations; and, of course, issuing in smaller denominations increases the expense. The war-saving certificates will be of very small denominations, and I doubt whether they can get a billion dollars at a cost of one-seventh of 1 per cent.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, I want to ask the gentleman if he has any other information besides what he has given in his able statement here as to what is the minimum denomination of the war-savings certificates proposed to be issued. Before the gentleman answers that I want to say what my judgment is about it. The success of a bond issue depends upon reaching the people of this country in the way of a popular loan, and the issue of certificates must be in small multiples of a dollar. That is to say, I would issue them from a dollar up. I want to ask what opinion the gentleman has about reaching the people on this bond issue, so that a man who has $2 or $5 can invest it in a Government security.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the plan will be to issue a book of stamps, so that a man can get a book of stamps, say for $4, and then he can, when he gets 25 cents or 50 cents, have that amount of stamps canceled, and then come back afterwards when he gets another 50 cents and have them canceled, and so when he gets $4 he will be entitled to a certificate of $5, payable without interest in five years. The five years' interest will be added in the certificate.

Mr. HOWARD. And obviate the collection of interest.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and that will carry out the gentleman's idea.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I will preface my question by stating that I want this loan to be a popular loan and to be subscribed for in full just as much as any gentleman on the floor of the House or any citizen. Now, it seems to me that when you take the exemption from taxation you leave the possibility of all these securities being liable to inheritance taxes and surtaxes, not under the present law but under future laws if we have to make additional loans.

This is to be a popular loan according to the Secretary, and I trust it may be a successful one. No man is going to subscribe for this loan if the surtaxes or other taxes are to take all of the interest. The people who are to subscribe for this loan must subscribe subject to future legislation. The future exemption may be two hundred or four hundred or six hundred dollars. It is proposed to be $1,000 in one case and $2,000 in another case. It is now three and four thousand.

Now, if they go to the people who will subscribe for $100 or $500 or a thousand dollars they must go to the vast class of the millions. Now, does not my friend think it would be better, when we reach section 7, to fix the amount below which we can not go; otherwise that one hundred millions of people, all of them, do not expect to be able to carry it? They may want to pay, to deposit it. This large amount, if it is a success, going to one hundred millions of people, will be effected by legislation that is possible or may be enacted if after all it is subjected to a surtax or has been subjected to a surtax that will make it an undesirable bond after it was issued. I merely call the gentleman's attention, if he has not thought of it, that he may think of it when we reach section 7 under the five-minute rule.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have given considerable thought to it. In my judgment a 4 per cent bond subject to the estate and inheritance tax as the bonds under the act of April 24, 1917, were, and subject to the surtaxes, will have more subscribers in number and more in amount than the 3½ per cent bond not subject to surtaxes. The two billion bonds recently sold, which were very largely oversubscribed, were subject to such estate and inheritance tax as Congress has already or may hereafter at any time impose, big or little, and subject to all the estate or inheritance taxes which any one or all of the 48 States now or may hereafter impose, and yet the people took those bonds without hesitation; they practically gobbled them up. Now, the gentleman will note that every State bond, every county or municipal bond is sold subject to payment of all State, county, and municipal taxes, providing the purchaser resides in a State other than the State of issue, and heretofore no difficulty has been incurred on that account in the sale. Bonds of railroads and of big industrial corporations are offered for sale, and the purchaser knows they are subject to all taxes of State, county, city, and Federal, income, or other taxes that are now or may hereafter be imposed, and yet they are sold every day without difficulty.

Mr. MADDEN. But the company issuing the bond pays the Government tax and all industrial taxes.

Mr. KITCHIN. They do not. They pay no State, county, or municipal tax for the holder of the bond, and only in certain cases do they pay the Federal income tax on the interest of their bonds. Some bonds issued by certain railroads and by the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and some other industrial corporations have what is called a tax-free covenant in them; that is, the corporation issuing the bond agrees that if the Government should by act require the retention by the corporation of a tax on the interest of the bond for the Government, it will pay the interest on the bond to the owner without deducting the tax. The present income-tax act has what is called "collection at the source," which requires the corporations to retain for and pay to the Government the normal income tax on the interest of its bond assessed against the owner. About six or eight million dollars taxes are now paid by the industrial corporations and railroads by virtue of the collection-at-the-source provision of the income-tax act, and by virtue of the tax-free covenant in their bonds the owner of the bond gets the full interest without deduction of the tax. I will remind the gentleman from Illinois in this connection that the Senate proposes to amend the pending revenue bill by striking out the collection-at-the-source provision and substituting therefor information at the source, which would relieve these industrial institutions and railroads of the payment of the tax and throw its payment on the owners of their bonds.

Mr. MADDEN. I hope the gentleman, as the head of the committee on conference of the House, will not yield to that sort of stuff.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman knows that I always stand by the will of the House in conference, and the House has twice passed on the question of retaining the collection at the source provided.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Just at that point, and I hope the gentleman may have a little more time—

Mr. KITCHIN. Give me five minutes more, and then I will stop.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman from North Carolina continuing for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Just at that point I take it that if these bonds and certificates go at par bearing 4 per cent interest in the main they must go to the millions of people?

Mr. KITCHIN. They will.

Mr. CANNON. Very well. Now, then, does not the gentleman—and I repeat my question—consider that this provision ought to be changed so that it would be out of the power of Congress to levy a surtax upon a man who holds one thousand or two thousand or three thousand dollars of them?

Mr. KITCHIN. It would not be so bad to have an exemption from the tax of that amount of bonds, but it would be unwise and bad policy to exempt the bonds in all amounts from the surtaxes.

It is the judgment of the committee and the judgment of the Secretary and of the experts of the Treasury who have had experience in selling Government bonds that these 4 per cent bonds subject to the supertax will have more subscribers in number and in amount than the 3½ per cent bonds free from such taxes. I believe that these bonds when offered for sale will be sufficiently subscribed by men who will never pay large, if any, surtax, by men whose incomes are under $20,000, and they will have millions of subscribers whose incomes are less than $5,000 annually.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman ask for one minute in order that I may ask him for an explanation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for two minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. On page 10, section 7, of the bill, line 10, we read this:

(a) Estate or inheritance taxes, and (b) graduated additional income taxes, commonly known as surtaxes, and excess-profits or war-profits taxes, now or hereafter imposed by the United States, upon the income or profits of individuals, partnerships, associations, or corporations.

Now, I would like to know how we are going to get excess-profits taxes on surtaxes or war-profits taxes on top of the excess-profits taxes charged against the bonds that the people of the United States buy at 4 per cent interest rate.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think I have explained it, but I will explain it to you.

Mr. MADDEN. That will be a combination of other incomes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course there will never be an excess profit under existing law if a man is going to put his whole investment in it. Suppose a corporation having $500,000 capital and surplus is making a net profit of $100,000. It has $100,000 of its capital in 4 per cent bonds, and the interest on the bonds is a part of the $100,000 net profit. It helps to make up the general whole. All the $100,000 net profit, including the $4,000 interest from the bonds, after deducting the 8 per cent exemption, would be the excess subject to the excess-profits tax.

Mr. MADDEN. So the interest received from bonds and added to other income is on a totally different basis from that which is received entirely from interest and bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. It goes to make the general excess. If this corporation had $100,000 in a savings bank at 4 per cent, the interest received from the bank would go to make up the total profit of $100,000, and the total profits being in excess of 8 per cent upon the capital invested, the excess-profits tax would attach to the excess.

Mr. REAVIS. In the original issue of 3½ per cent bonds the privilege was granted to convert any subsequent bonds at a higher interest rate. If that conversion is made, will the original bond that is converted be subjected to the supertax provided for in this bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAVIS. So they would have the privilege of either retaining the 3½ per cent bonds of the recent issue—

Mr. KITCHIN. Or converting them into the 4 per cent provided for in the bill. A man that pays a heavy supertax is going to keep his 3½ per cent.

Mr. REAVIS. And this bill is one way of persuading him to do that?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. He is going to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Section 7 provides, by way of exception, that these bonds shall be subject to tax (a) of a State or inheritance tax, (b) a graduated income tax, and (c) excess-profits or war-profits taxes. Is that use of the word "or" in there intended to convey the idea that excess profits and war profits are synonymous and mean the same thing?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I will tell you why that was put in. The gentleman will doubtless see the wisdom of it. The House in the revenue bill now pending in the Senate provided for what is known as the "excess-profits tax," to cover not only the profits caused by the war but profits made in any way in excess of $5,000 and 8 per cent on the capital invested. The Senate Finance Committee reported amendments striking that out and putting in a so-called war-profits tax, assuming that all the profits made over and above those of 1913, 1912, and 1911 were made out of and on account of the war. It is called in the amendment "war-profits" tax. We were not certain whether Congress would provide for an "excess-profits" tax or a "war-profits" tax, so we used both terms to catch either.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman recognizes that there is a very clear distinction to be made between the words "excess profits" and "war profits"?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, the language in this bill, in order to carry out that distinction, so that it would allow no possibility of mistake, ought to read this way: "Except (a) estate and inheritance taxes, (b) graduated income taxes, (c) excess-profits taxes, and (d) war-profits taxes."

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman's first suggestion to substitute "and" for "or" would be sufficient to make the distinction.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. By leaving out those letters and substituting "and" for "or" you would do away with the impression that they are the same?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think the gentleman is correct and the change of "or" into "and" should be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have used a great deal more time than I intended. I thank the gentlemen for their patience. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for two hours.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I will be as brief as possible. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has explained every feature of this measure.

I first want to say that if this bill is enacted into law as it is now before this House it will carry a larger authorization of the expenditure of money than has ever been carried in any bill in any legislative body in the world. Therefore it is a matter of serious thought for the men who are called upon to act in this matter.

There are two things that we undoubtedly can all agree upon. One is that we are at war with several great nations of the world; second, that we hope to win, and we are in the war to win if it is within our power to do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman says we are at war with several great nations.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We have declared war against only one, have we not, and none has declared war against us?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is true we have declared war against Germany only, but Germany's allies are Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey, and consequently we are at war with all those nations, although we have not declared war against all those nations. The gentleman from Milwaukee [Mr. STAFFORD] shakes his head. I wonder if an army from Turkey assaulted American soldiers whether or not you would fight whether we had declared war or not?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly I would fight.

Mr. FORDNEY. You shook your head.

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly I shook my head, because we are not at war with Austria-Hungary, Turkey, or Bulgaria; and Austrians, Hungarians, Turks, and Bulgarians are not in this country considered enemy subjects.

Mr. FORDNEY. I know that as well as you do, and I ask you to answer that question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have already answered it.

Mr. FORDNEY. You would fight if you were attacked by those nations without a formal declaration of war, would you not?

Mr. STAFFORD. They have not attacked us as yet.

Mr. FORDNEY. They are the allies of Germany, and consequently our enemies, and if you would not fight them you are not a loyal American citizen. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are sending our Army to a foreign land to fight. We are sending the best of our men. Now comes the time, my friends, when we are called upon to tax our people large sums of money to properly support our Army in a foreign land. Let me say nobody likes taxes. Nobody wants to be taxed. Taxes are objectionable, especially when you feel that they are excessive.

In 1861, during the Civil War, which has passed and gone—and God knows that we are all glad that it is over with and nearly forgotten—there were 31,000,000 people in the United States. Twenty-one millions of those people were in the Northern States, and the cost of that Civil War per capita, based on the population of the States in the North, was in round numbers $342 per capita, or 39 per cent of the total wealth of all the United States, according to the census of 1860. If this war is carried on until the per capita tax on our population of to-day reaches $342, as was the case in the Civil War, our public debt will be $35,000,000,000, or about 13 per cent of the wealth of the country as estimated at this time. We are not afraid of going "broke" during this war. The people of this country will pay this debt. The people of the United States never did and never will repudiate their debts. We claim to be an honest and patriotic people. I am ready to pay my share to carry on this war successfully, and so are you, and so is every other loyal American citizen. [Applause.] And the man who will not pay his fair share, based upon his ability to pay, I say is not a true, loyal American citizen.

Mr. BUTLER. Not much of a friend of the Republic.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is correct. The public debt of the Civil War, in round numbers, including interest, of course, up to the time when the figures were given, was $6,190,000,000 in the North. I remember that war very well. I had two brothers in that war; one never came back, and his remains lie at Nashville, Tenn. My father paid $30 a barrel for flour in the State of Indiana at one time during the Civil War. Prices are high now because of the abnormal conditions all over the world. Practically the whole world is at war. Men are engaged in destroying life and property instead of producing. And while those conditions last, my friends, we must expect the cost of living to be high in this and all other countries.

In this bill there are some things that I would like to have changed—two in particular. I will not offer amendments to that effect. I will be loyal to the committee. I felt it my duty to be bound by the majority of the members of that committee. I will bow to the will of the majority here. I will vote for the bill just as it is if it is not amended and made better, because we must have this money soon to carry on the war. The two things which I would like to see improved are these: First of all, I think it is a serious mistake for the Government to impose a tax upon these bonds, and I will tell you briefly why. The other day I asked the Secretary of the Treasury what was the average subscription for the liberty bonds recently sold, and he replied less than $800, and was corrected by one of his assistants, who said the average subscription was about $500. Therefore this last liberty-bond issue of $2,000,000,000 went to small investors, as the greater portion of the money derived from the sale of bonds in the future may go. It is true that by and by, perhaps, when the small investor has no further funds to invest, we must go to men of larger means. The language of this bill guards against giving any advantage to men of great wealth.

But when this war is over, do you think for a minute that a man with $500 invested in a liberty bond running for a term of from 15 to 30 years will hold that bond until it is paid by the Government? No; not at all. He will want the money for a first payment on a little home, or something of that kind. He is advised to-day, when he is requested to invest his money, that he can at any time go to the bank and sell that bond and realize on it. When the war is over, my friends, these small investors will want to realize on their bonds, or a great number of them will. Do you believe that after this war is over the man with money to loan will purchase a taxable bond which will not yield him as great an income on his money as he could otherwise obtain? If you think so, I do not agree with you. I would not do it to-day if I were a money lender. My patriotism induces me to loan money to this Government to help carry on this war, but not because the return upon the investment is greater than I could obtain elsewhere. And do you think that I would surrender a bond bearing interest at 3½ per cent free from taxes and accept a bond bearing 4 per cent and subject to taxes? No; the average investor will not do that. That is a great and serious mistake, in my opinion, to make these bonds subject to taxes when all outstanding Government bonds are exempt from taxes. We need not be alarmed about a very large amount of money being invested in those bonds to escape taxation. In this as in the last liberty-bond sales the small investor will take the major portion of the bonds.

Again, in the war certificates authorized by this bill it is provided that the Secretary of the Treasury may fix the rate of interest which in his judgment will be for the best interests of the Government. I believe that the rate of interest should be limited. The Secretary of the Treasury should not be permitted to dispose of those bonds bearing a rate of interest in excess of 4 per cent. There is a limit somewhere for the Congress of the United States to go in fixing the rate of interest for this Government to pay upon its bonds.

Let me call your attention to this fact: Only a few years ago the Congress of the United States blushed when called upon to appropriate annually $800,000,000 or $900,000,000 a year to carry on the running expenses of this Government. Four per cent interest upon $20,000,000,000 of indebtedness, which is equivalent to the amount authorized now if this bill is enacted into law, makes the annual interest alone upon our public debt $800,000,000. I repeat, my friends, that the interest upon the public debt, if it reaches $25,000,000,000 or $30,000,000,000, is going to be equal to the sums heretofore appropriated for the ordinary running expenses of this Government annually, and it is a great and serious matter of consideration for you.

During the Civil War the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Salmon P. Chase, authorized agents to sell Government bonds, and Jay Cook, of Philadelphia, a banker, was the first man called upon and given the agency for the sale of Government bonds. And let me say in passing that a very large amount of money borrowed during the Civil War by the Government was borrowed upon short-time certificates of indebtedness, and Jay Cook established 2,500 agencies all over the Northern States under the first authorization for the sale of bonds. One-fifth of 1 per cent was paid as a commission for the first $100,000 of loans, and thereafter one-eighth of 1 per cent was paid. That was paid in commissions. That did not include all the cost of selling those bonds. The expense of printing and the work done in the departments here at Washington, which was very great, was added to that expense. So when we are fixing in this bill one-seventh of 1 per cent as the limit of cost for the Secretary of the Treasury to spend in disposing of our long-time bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent on the certificates of indebtedness I believe we are fixing a minimum amount for the Secretary of the Treasury to expend.

During the Civil War, as contrasted with now, the first $150,000,000 of bonds sold by the Government bore a rate of interest of 7.3 per cent. The next issue of Government bonds carried an interest rate of 7 per cent. The next authorization carried an interest rate of 6 per cent, and the fourth and last issue carried 5 per cent. As the war went on you will see that the Government reduced the rate of interest which the bonds carried, whereas we are increasing now the rate of interest which our bonds shall carry.

Practically all the bonds issued during the Civil War were short-time bonds, none of which ran beyond five years from the date of issue. All these bonds came due directly after the war and were refunded and issued in long-time bonds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not the reason that the rate of interest decreased toward the last end of the Civil War because on the 4th of July, 1862, they put into operation the great internal-revenue scheme whereby after they got it to running full blast it brought in $311,000,000 a year, and that gave the people more confidence in the bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; that is right.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One more question. The gentleman says that his father paid $30 a barrel for flour.

Mr. FORDNEY. In the State of Indiana.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That was in depreciated currency, bonds selling then as low as 39 cents on the dollar, and during the next 12 months they stood between 40 and 50.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman that flour is selling now for $15 and $16 a barrel in the State of Michigan.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I thought the price had been brought down.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; it has been brought up. [Laughter.] And let me say to the gentleman that the fixing of the price of wheat at $2.20 a bushel is not going to bring down the price of flour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the minimum price of $2.20 a bushel for North Dakota No. 1 wheat going to make wheat sell for in other parts of the country?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is hard for me to answer; I can only prophesy. Let me say this to the gentleman. I was at one time engaged in the manufacture of flour. I was a miller. I was in the business long enough to lose all the money I put in, but I learned something. It requires, from the most economical method employed and the most modern mills of the country, 4 bushels and 40 pounds of good wheat to make 196 pounds of flour. You estimate the value of wheat at $2.20 a bushel; and taking 4 bushels and 40 pounds—and the average mill will use 5 bushels—you will have $11 worth of wheat for a barrel of flour.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not one-twentieth of the wheat raised in the United States is hard No. 1, and by the time you grade it down to red 2 and 3, and then pay for the transportation and the commission, it cuts the price of wheat in Illinois, Missouri, and the rest of the country where they raise wheat down to about $1.60 a bushel.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman in reply to his question that at the time when flour was $30 a barrel in the State of Indiana during the Civil War our currency had not depreciated to about one-third, or 33 cents on the dollar. It was along the latter part of the war that prices were high. We had no gold to send abroad to buy wheat. The country was drained of gold and there was a shortage of wheat production in the whole country. We had, as we may have in this war, a large part of our people on the battlefield, and crops at home were neglected. There was a greater demand than the supply provided for; consequently up went the prices. Sugar was 75 cents a pound, kerosene 80 cents a gallon, and so on. But that has nothing to do with this argument. Prices are high and will be high until the war is over. Some men within the sound of my voice will not agree with me that we should raise a very large proportion of the money spent in this war by borrowing money to be paid at some future day. That is my opinion. Instead of taxing the people now such large sums of money that the taxes are burdensome, we should borrow a large part of it.

For instance, I want to call your attention to the taxes of the Civil War in proportion to the amount of money borrowed. In 1862, for every dollar collected by taxes from the people we borrowed that year $8.52. For the year 1863, for every dollar of taxes directly upon the people we borrowed $5.51. In 1864, for every dollar of taxes we put upon the people we borrowed $3.38. For the last year, 1864 to 1865, for every dollar of taxes we put upon the people we borrowed $2.95. In other words, the borrowed money raised by the sale of bonds and the disposal of Treasury notes during these four years was $1 based on an average of $5.09 borrowed. The people benefited by that great Civil War later on willingly and readily and easily paid the debts of the Civil War.

All the people of the North and the South came in, and, notwithstanding the great burden of the debt put upon the people of the South from their side of the war, they contributed their share to the payment of that great war debt, and it was not a burden upon anybody. Therefore, I say that we should raise a large part of the money to carry on this war from borrowed money, because if there is any merit in this war, future generations will enjoy the benefits. We should not be called upon to furnish the fine manhood of this country to be slaughtered on the battle field and at the same time be called upon to pay the war debt as we go along.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Does the gentleman think there is any hope, from the present status of affairs, for us to increase the custom duties and tariff rates in the bill now in the Senate for a bill which will be here next session?

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. I want to serve notice on the country right now that I have gone to the limit in taxing the people for money to carry on this war unless the Congress of the United States adds something to our import taxes from now on. [Applause on the Republican side.] That money can be raised without any great burden upon the people by indirect taxation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If we do not levy taxes as much as we ought to, a fair proportion, say 50-50, is it not inevitable that these bonds will go below par just as they did during the Civil War, except not so much so?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman misunderstood me. I want to raise a great portion of the money from import taxes instead of direct taxes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know, but that is a horse of a different color.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is what I meant to say in my statement and the way I meant to be understood.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understood the gentleman to say we ought to carry on this war principally by the issue of these bonds—

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (continuing). Instead of levying taxes.

Mr. FORDNEY. So much.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, now, that ends this way, that the men who do the fighting will have to come back here after the war is over—those who survive—and help to pay this very war debt. (Applause on the Democratic side.)

Mr. FORDNEY. That is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Whereas, if we pay this thing 50-50, or somewhere in that neighborhood, these bonds are not going to depreciate, although there are gamblers who have tried to force the 3½ per cent bonds down and did force them down almost to 99 on two different days on the Stock Exchange in New York.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, no matter what portion of the money to carry on this war we raise by borrowing money, it must be paid by future generations, by future people, at a future date, not right now. That was true in the Civil War, was it not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, it was true in the Civil War bonds ran down on one day to 39 cents on the dollar and stood for a whole year between 40 and 50, and very few of them ever did sell at par. Then when the day of payment came they had to pay for those bonds at face value.

Mr. FORDNEY. All during Secretary Chase's administration he insisted every minute that no bonds should be sold at less than par, and they were not sold at less than par in our money then in use.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why, the tables show they stood at between 40 and 50 per cent for over 12 months.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was after they had been disposed of by the Government, as I get it from history. I refer the gentleman to the financial history published by Dewey for my authority.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have got a history of every dollar that was ever issued and how much the Government got for it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I may be mistaken in some particular instance, but on the whole my statement is about accurate, I believe.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, they were paid for at their face value finally, were they not?

Mr. FORDNEY. By the Government; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, we go to work and we do not levy taxes enough to make those bonds absolutely good and they commence to go down below par, and then when the war is over we have to pay for them at their face value?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KIRCHIN] stated, whether we raise the interest to 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent, 10 per cent, or 15 per cent matters not, for whatever rate of interest is necessary to raise money to support our men in the field that is what the people of the United States will do.

They will pay any rate of interest that is made necessary, and as an individual I have been a money borrower all of my life and expect to be all of my life. When the time comes when I must have money to meet my obligations I borrow it and pay such rate of interest as the money lender exacts from me because I must have it or I must fail, and we are in this war to win and not to fail and we will pay whatever is necessary. Now, let me call attention—

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MEEKER. Do we have an understanding here now that when the next revenue bill comes up the Republican side of the House is going to stand pat on a new tariff schedule?

Mr. FORDNEY. I speak for myself only.

Mr. MEEKER. That is enough.

Mr. FORDNEY. I say I will not vote for any other bill for the raising of money to carry on this war that does not carry some proportion of an increase of import duty upon imported goods. [Applause on the Republican side.] We have not touched that question in the House bill. In the revenue bill now pending in the Senate there was a tax provision placing additional duty upon imports, very unscientifically arranged, but the additional import duties proposed would yield, if enacted into law as provided for in that bill as it passed the House, more additional money than will this year be collected under the existing law known as the Underwood tariff law.

The rate provided for in the bill was an additional 10 per cent ad valorem and the rate collected under the Underwood law runs on an average of about 9 per cent. Therefore, it would little more than double our income from customs dues if the bill had gone into effect as it left us. During the Civil War, in 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, there was collected from customs dues on imported goods $305,600,000. During that same time there was collected from internal revenue and income taxes $336,000,000. I will not give the odd figures. From miscellaneous sale of lands and otherwise $4,956,000, and from the sale of bonds during that time and Treasury notes disposed of $2,622,000,000, or a total of $3,289,000,000. The largest amount of bonded indebtedness at any one time existing in the Civil War was, in round numbers, $2,846,000. During the Revolutionary War the expenses by the colonies were so very great that when the Nation was organized it was said by many men in public life at that time that our public debts never would be paid, but they were paid, and only a very brief time after the war we were out of debt, something that seldom happens to any great nation. When this war is over our debts will be very great, but we have the ability to pay them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman another question.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. As you know, there never were but two years since this Government was organized when it was out of debt, and that was during John Tyler's administration, and they paid it all off except $7,000 of bonds, and they never could find who owned those bonds. Consequently they counted it out. Two years during John Tyler's administration was the only time this country was ever out of debt.

Mr. FORDNEY. Possibly the gentleman is right. It is my recollection that I am correct.

Mr. CANNON. During the administration of Gen. Jackson we were out of debt and distributed the surplus among the States.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They got the country out of debt as far as they could get hold of anything to pay. The surplus increased during Gen. Jackson's administration, and they went on paying these bonds off. Finally they paid them all off except $7,000, and they passed the law the gentleman is talking about. Col. Benton, of Missouri, fought tooth and nail the idiotic proposition of the United States Government parceling out this surplus among the States, and they never got a nickel of it back. Then the panic came after they had distributed two of these portions annually, and they got in the hole again, and did not have money enough with which to run the Government, so they had to create a new debt. Then the war came on, and they bonded the country. Then the Civil War came on, and we owe $1,100,000,000 of that debt yet.

Mr. FORDNEY. If the men I owe should happen to die and leave no relatives, I do not know to whom I would pay that debt, and I would not pay it until I found somebody that held the obligation and to whom it justly belonged. So if we could not find the holder of the $7,000, we were out of debt. The short-time bonds or certificates of indebtedness has been a thing that has been resorted to since the beginning of the Civil War. I do not know if they were issued before. But I believe, and I am going to insist, that it is a great mistake to leave it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the rate of interest paid upon those bonds at will on his part. The Secretary of the Treasury under the law is the chairman of the Federal Board. The certificates of indebtedness disposed of up to this time have been largely taken by the Federal banks at from 2 to 3½ per cent interest per annum. The Secretary of the Treasury had the power under the existing law to commandeer the money in the Federal bank, and, God knows, if he can not sell a short-time bond at a rate of interest not exceeding 4 per cent, how can he hope to sell a long-time bond for a rate of interest at less than 4 per cent? And I say that we are not tying the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury when we limit the rate of interest that he can pay on a short-time bond to a sum equal to that which he is authorized to fix in a long-time bond. Therefore, I say it is a great mistake, because this long-time bond can be disposed of, issued, and reissued, and reissued, and there is no limit to the time or the number of times that the Secretary of the Treasury can reissue those certificates of indebtedness. When one comes due he can renew it by selling another and getting the money to retire the first one sold, and always, at least, keep one-half of those certificates of indebtedness outstanding by having another to renew it with.

Now, in my opinion, there are two objects in loaning money to the allies. First, let me say that the Secretary of the Treasury has stated that the loans to the allies so far have averaged $500,000,000 a month to all of them. Judging the future by the past, the amount of loans will be about $500,000,000 a month, or $6,000,000,000 annually. Some gentleman asked the question—I think it was my good friend from Chicago, Mr. MADDEN—a few minutes ago as to what portion of the cost of this war the foreign nations are raising at home outside of the money we are loaning them. It was stated by the Secretary of the Treasury that during the last four months England raised at home $1,800,000,000, while we loaned them their portion of this $2,000,000,000 already loaned to England and her allies. In other words, the money they are spending to carry on this war, borrowed from us, amounts to but a very small portion of their total expenditures. Further, the Secretary of the Treasury called attention to this, that the loan of $275,000,000 had been agreed upon to the Russian Government. The Russian Government had called for, up to the 24th of August, but $87,500,000. Two months ago, he stated, the Government of Russia had placed orders in this country for 10,000 railroad cars and, as I now remember it, 500 locomotives. The party contracting with the Russian Government demanded, and the Russian Government conceded to their demands, that $45,000,000 of the money to go to the Russian Government should be left in the hands of our Government, to be turned over to our people making those cars and locomotives when that order was filled.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield; yes, sir.

Mr. MADDEN. What would the gentleman from Michigan think of the advisability of the Congress of the United States stipulating in this law that any moneys loaned to the allies should be loaned upon the condition that it should be expended in the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not believe that we should tie the hands of our allies in this war in that way. I do not think it would be wise. Let me say to my good friend, it is my opinion that the more money we loan to the allies to permit them to efficiently equip their armies and send them to the front the less number of men from this side of the line will be called upon.

I made one statement here before, but let me repeat it: I had rather give up every dollar of the wealth I have than to give up the life of my son.

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, of course. Everybody feels exactly like the gentleman from Michigan; but I suppose it will be conceded on every hand that we are raising all the money we can provide now, and it is proper that we should, and that we will not raise any less number of men because of the fact that we give more money; but the question arises whether, when we are obligating the people of the United States to such large expenditures for the purpose of aiding our friendly allies in the movement in which we have engaged, we should not protect ourselves to some extent by saying that, to the extent that it is possible to do it, this money should be expended among our own people?

Mr. FORDNEY. That might be wise; but, my good friend, during the Revolutionary War, when France sent her armies here well equipped, paid them, provisioned them, and furnished them with arms and ammunition to help us fight our battles, she had at the same time loaned us large sums of money, and she did not limit the place where we must expend that money. [Applause.] And we are now sending to France, to aid her in this awful struggle, our men, and we are loaning her large sums of money, and I do not believe it would be wise for us to limit the place and the purpose for which she must expend that money. But I do believe, as the Secretary of the Treasury has stated to us, that from 80 to 90 per cent, or possibly a larger proportion, of that money we are loaning to the allies abroad is now being spent in the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, to the extent of 80 or 90 per cent the suggestion I have just made is being carried out. It is not being carried out to the extent of the other 10 per cent; but the question is, Could it not be?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe they will expend it here; I believe it from all the information I can obtain.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman believe that, in the authorization of the issuance of such a large amount of bonds for the purpose of loaning money to the allies, the Congress, representing the people, ought to have any limitation placed on the power of the Executive which would restrict the right of the Executive to loan indiscriminately without consultation with anybody except the allies?

Mr. FORDNEY. That leads to another question that I did not intend to mention.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is well to mention it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am glad the gentleman mentioned it. I am prepared to and will a little later, if the House will bear with me—not to-day, not on this bill—make a statement about the committee appointed during the Civil War to look into the conduct of the war, or rather the appointment of a committee on the conduct of the war. The President of the United States stated some time ago that that committee during the Civil War was objectionable to President Lincoln. I want to show by the record that he was in error when he made that statement, and that the committee of seven was of the most wonderful benefit to the administration in the conduct of the war, by their advice and the information they obtained to present to the President and to the Secretary of War and to the Secretary of the Navy. The chairman of that committee was Benjamin Wade, a most distinguished character and a distinguished Member of the Senate. Senator Chandler, from the State of Michigan, was a member of the committee. I want, my friends, at the first opportunity—which I hope will not be long distant—to vote for a committee to be appointed by the Congress of the United States to examine into the expenditures of this war. I want that committee to be of benefit to the administration. Nothing that I have done or will do in the future will tie the hands of the administration or deprive it of the greatest freedom in the conduct of this war. I want to aid the administration by my every effort, and I would be the last man that would do anything to the contrary.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Pardon me; let me finish that sentence first. No partisanship down to date has been brought into this House on any bill affecting this war, and I hope none will be. It is the farthest from my mind. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MEEKER. Is not the work that has just been mentioned by the gentleman from Michigan understood to be the function at the present time of the board of advisers, the Council of National Defense and Mr. Hoover? Is not that what they are there for?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a moment. Mr. Hoover is supposed to have been appointed at the head of a body of men to look into the cost of supplies in this country, and if possible to hold down the cost of living and the cost of supplies of every kind. I hope some good may come from that commission, but they have a wonderful task on their hands.

I yield now to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Would the gentleman think it would be in aid of the conduct of the war to have such a committee, who would force or could force and doubtless would force all the detailed information about the number of aeroplanes, about the number of submarines, and about the equipment that we are building and supplying? Does the gentleman really think that would be an aid or a hindrance to the conduct of the war?

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe it would aid. I can give you two instances.

Mr. FERRIS. I wish the gentleman would elaborate that. In my opinion it would cause positive harm.

Mr. FORDNEY. It has come to light in the last few days that some of the ammunition sent abroad has been found to be defective. Perhaps the assistance of a body which has no other duty except to look into these affairs might avoid that very thing. For instance, down at Quantico the other day some hand bombs were being used by the boys in practicing. A trench about 2 feet or 2½ feet wide was dug, representing the enemy, and the men were being trained in the art of throwing those hand grenades over to the trench. Some of them did not explode, unknown to the officers and men, and a few minutes later the boys set to work filling in that trench or throwing out the debris that had gone into it, and some of those bombs exploded and killed one boy and injured several others. Those bombs were defective. Some more critical examination ought to be made than has been made in the past.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think a Member of this House would have the technical qualifications and knowledge that would be necessary even to find out about these defective caps of which the gentleman has spoken?

Mr. FORDNEY. If you could not find that technical knowledge here I do not know where you could find it.

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think that the students in the War College and the men who have had years of training in the War College and in the department and on the staff would be apt to have more technical information than any of us here, who have only general knowledge?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me give you another illustration. A short time ago orders were given to the committee handling lumber, so I was informed by a member of that committee, to purchase doors and window sash and glass for the buildings that we are putting up to house our men all over the country. In one particular instance about 44,000 window sash were ordered, all of which carried a particular size of window glass, as provided for in the specifications; and when inquiry was made by the board it was found that there are no glass manufacturers in the country making that size of window glass. Some window-glass manufacturers in the State of Pennsylvania were asked when they could furnish glass of that size, and they said it would take them months to change their machinery and make glass of that size, and they did not want to engage in its manufacture; that that size of glass had not been made for years. A member of the board went to a certain representative of the War Department and asked, "Why did you specify that size of glass? We can not find it in the market." When he looked the matter up he found that those specifications had been ordered in 1883 and that they never had been changed. [Laughter.] It does not need a very great expert to know more than the fellow knows who ordered those specifications, does it? [Applause.] When the matter was called to the attention of the proper bureau of the War Department they were requested to order such sizes of window glass as were commonly upon the market, and immediately they received notification from various glass manufacturers, "We have several carloads on hand and can ship it at once." [Applause.]

Mr. BURNETT. Does not the gentleman think that the very fact that these things were liable to be reviewed by a committee would probably make the department a great deal more particular and not so reckless in the contracts that they make and the things that they call for?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I think so. Again, I do not know whether my information is correct, but in a statement furnished by the Secretary of War it is estimated that for this year's expenditures there are needed $640,000,000 already authorized by Congress for the purchase of aeroplanes. I have been informed recently that the Government has been paying twice as much for those aeroplanes as they could have been purchased for. I believe a committee of intelligent men, to examine these questions, will see to it that fabulous prices are not paid. [Applause.] I am not criticizing anybody. I do not want to do so. I would not under any circumstances unless I knew some one was to blame. But during war time it always has been and always will be true that the demand for supplies of every description is so great, and purchases are in the hands of so many men, that money will be extravagantly spent unless scrutinized with the greatest care possible.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman think it would in any way hamper the President if a committee of this kind were appointed, and if information which would not ordinarily go to the President and perhaps could not go to him should be laid before him by that committee?

Mr. FORDNEY. If I were a member of that committee, or if you were a member of that committee, and there came up a question as to the purchase of certain kinds of supplies with which we were very familiar, as to their cost and production, we would express ourselves to the full committee and give them reliable information as to the cost of production, and the value of those things and the necessity for them. For instance, when we have a hearing before any committee of the House, if you and I want to know what it costs to make the works of a Waltham watch, we do not send for a blacksmith over in Georgetown, but we send for the manager of the Waltham Watch Co., and we very readily can tell whether he is a truthful man or not.

So we get valuable information. Pardon me for suggesting that I am a lumberman and have been in the lumber business all my life. A few days ago the New Orleans Picayune said I might know something about rolling logs, but that I did not know anything up here. I do know something about the manufacture of lumber, for I have had long experience in that line, and if any man not thoroughly familiar with that industry should ask me about the cost of production of lumber and the value of different kinds of lumber in the manufacture and value of a particular grade I could tell him, whereas a man not skilled in that industry would not know the value of one grade of lumber as compared with another. I would give him the benefit of my experience, and so would you if you were skilled in some other industry. We want a great many different articles in this war, clothing of every description, provisions of every kind. If a question came up about a certain article, and you were a member of such a committee and were skilled in that industry you would give them the benefit of your good judgment, and if some other member was skilled in some other industry, you would go to him for his information, and in that way get valuable information. Therefore I believe a commission appointed to investigate and have some control over the expenditures of this great volume of money we are appropriating to carry on this war would be of inestimable value to our Government instead of a detriment.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. I understood the gentleman a moment ago to say that he had an instance where they were paying a double price for aeroplanes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I was told by several that such was the fact, and I saw it also in the newspapers that the prices already paid for aeroplanes were double what should have been paid, but that is all hearsay, so far as my information goes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That charge was made in the New York World, that they paid more for parts than the whole machine could be bought for.

Mr. FERRIS. Would the gentleman be willing to give the House the facts as to who paid it, when it was paid, and where they paid double? I share with the gentleman in his solicitude for economy.

Mr. FORDNEY. I stated, in the first place, that I did not know whether the statement was correct, and I was criticizing no man.

Mr. FERRIS. Does anybody know whether the charge is true? If it is, they ought to be stopped.

Mr. FORDNEY. I saw in the papers that the Government had discovered that it was paying more than double price for aeroplanes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Did it not mean that the investigation showed that it came largely from the stock that is used for aeroplanes in this country?

Mr. FERRIS. I have the same solicitation as to keeping down expenses that the speaker has, and all I was trying to do was to find if anything was wrong and let it be headed off.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Aeroplane lumber went up in price from $30 to $120 a thousand. Now they are still calling for spruce stock, hand-dressed fir timber. I wonder why it is to be hand dressed?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, except that I do know this: All aeroplane stock being purchased on the Pacific coast is high-priced at present, and while we are not manufacturing lumber of that kind, we are selling spruce logs to mills that produce that stock. The difference between lumber sawed across the grain and with the grain is very great in value. Lumber sawed across the grain, called vertical grain, is more valuable than what is called slashed grain. Therefore the vertical grain sawed spruce is selling at $140 a thousand where slashed grain is one-half that price. The vertical grain is stronger, and freer from splits when a nail or a bolt is put into it. It is more valuable in every respect—in its durability—and when hand dressed I presume that the defects in the boards are less affected, because when the boards are put through a planing machine which travels at a high rate of speed the cross and curly grain sometimes weakens the wood and strength of the board. Where it is dressed by hand the man dressing it can avoid that and leave all the strength in the boards. That is the difference between the machine and the hand dressed, possibly; it is a new phrase to me.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In reference to the cost of aeroplanes, is it not true that the Government has aeroplanes manufactured at cost of production plus 10 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. There are such contracts, and there are many such contracts for wooden ships whereby the contractor is given the cost of production plus 10 per cent.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand. With reference to the $640,000,000 appropriated to be used by the War Department in the manufacture of aeroplanes, I saw the statement in a paper yesterday where a gentleman by the name of Baker had explained that the cost of production plus 10 per cent was not deemed sufficient, but he would not admit to a reporter that 20 per cent was too much. He said that so many machines were rejected that 10 per cent was not sufficient.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman stated that he did not know of his own knowledge where we were purchasing aeroplanes at a price double what they could be bought for.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I stated that I did not know if that was correct—that I saw it in some paper. The matter has also been mentioned in my presence several times.

Mr. REAVIS. If we had a committee on expenditures we could find those things out.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and could investigate these questions.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield to me at that point?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. We have 12 committees on expenditures in the House, have we not?

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Has there been any recent evidence of these committees on expenditures in the House?

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, the Committee on Appropriations investigates these questions presented to them very carefully and very thoroughly.

Mr. REAVIS. Has there been any activity on the part of any expenditure committee that the gentleman knows of?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not beyond the ordinary, but there may be things that I am not aware of.

Mr. MADDEN. There was a movement a short time ago to get a clerk to one of these committees.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, I will take a few moments in giving the necessary sums of money to be appropriated for this fiscal year, as stated by the Treasury Department, for the expenses of the Government to the amount of $1,962,000,000. I will not take the time of the House to state all of the items: Agriculture, $25,920,000; the Army, $273,000,000; the Diplomatic and Consular Service, $5,000,000; the District of Columbia, $14,000,000; fortifications, $51,000,000; Indian, $11,000,000; legislative, $39,000,000; Military Academy, $1,344,000; Navy, $517,000,000; pensions, $160,000,000; Post Office, $331,000,000; rivers and harbors, $27,000,000; sundry civil, $147,000,000.

There are other expenditures, making a total, together with the bond issue, of $9,134,000,000.

I will here present statistics received from the Treasury Department which are very interesting:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 25, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. KITCHIN: By direction of the Secretary, and in reply to the verbal inquiry of Mr. Walker, clerk of the Committee on Ways and Means, for information as to the amount of loans made to the allies to date and the countries to which the same were made, I have to advise you as follows:

July 21, 1917.....	4,499,674,445	21,897,666,000

NOTE.—Data for the three years ending March 31, 1914–1916, are official. Later figures are approximate only. They have been estimated by adding the amounts of net borrowings during a given period to the amount of debt as officially stated for March 31, 1916. Net borrowings during the fiscal year 1916–17 were £1,625,545,981; from April 1 to July 21, 1917, the amount borrowed was £676,689,219. Total net borrowings since the beginning of the war, August 1, 1914, to July 21, 1917, have been £3,871,742,607. The figures include £1,171,000,000 advanced to the allies and British Dominions.

Apr. 30, 1917.....	91,849,810,000	17,727,013,000

NOTE.—The first item includes 31,456,396,709 francs of the funded debt as per date December 31, 1913, and 1,432,412,800 francs of the floating debt as per date September 30, 1914. Later figures have been estimated by adding amounts borrowed since August 1, 1914. The borrowings during the first 30 months of the war, August 1, 1914, to January 31, 1917, totaled 51,761,000,000 francs, distributed as follows: Consolidated debt, two 5 per cent loans, 1915 and 1916, aggregating 21,754,000,000 francs; bonds of national defense (floating debt), 13,674,000,000 francs; short-term loans, placed abroad 7,836,000,000 francs; advances by the Bank of France and the Bank of Algeria, 8,497,000,000 francs. Between January 31 and April 30, 1917, the debt increased by 7,200,000,000 francs.

Advances to the allied countries to the amount of 3,875,000,000 francs have been authorized by the laws of December 29, 1915, and February 18, 1917.

Jan. 1, 1916.....	18,876,731,000	9,721,516,000
Jan. 1, 1917.....	25,220,937,000	12,988,782,000

NOTE.—The figures of debt for January 1, 1916, and 1917, are from the official Vvestnik of the Ministry of Finance for October 1, 1916. The amount stated for January 1, 1917, is the amount of debt as then "expected." The real debt was probably much higher in rubles, although its equivalent in dollars may have been lower. In this table the ruble have been converted at the rate of 51.5 cents, its par value, but its exchange value in New York averaged only about 30 cents during 1916. The New York quotation of the ruble during the first business day of the years 1914–1917 have been as follows: 51½–51¾, 43, 29½–29¾, 30.05–30.15. On August 15, 1917, the ruble was quoted at 20.70–20.90 cents. In Petrograd the quotation on June 1, 1917, was 3.40 rubles for $1. Minister Terestcherko estimated that the debt would increase to about 55,000,000,000 rubles by January 1, 1918.

ITALY—PUBLIC DEBT.

	Lire.	Dollars.
June 30, 1914.....	14,466,870,000	2,792,106,000
June 30, 1915.....	18,927,385,000	3,652,985,000
January 1, 1917.....	31,438,339,000	6,067,600,000

NOTE.—The figure of debt for June 30, 1914, represents the net debt on that date (gross debt less securities held by the treasury). The amount for January 1, 1917, as reported by the Gazzetta di Lausanne, includes the following items: Consolidated debt, 10,051,088,797 lire; amortizable debt, 14,392,332,835 lire; treasury bonds, 3,258,027,000 lire; treasury bills (paper money) 1,308,300,000 lire; bank notes issued for the account of the Government, 2,428,590,400 lire; total, 31,438,339,032 lire.

The lira has been converted at the rate of 19.3 cents, its par value. The present exchange value of the lira is somewhat less, however.

GERMANY—PUBLIC DEBT.

	Marks.	Dollars.
Sept. 30, 1913.....	5,177,225,300	1,232,179,600
Sept. 30, 1914.....	5,260,394,300	1,251,973,800
Sept. 30, 1915.....	26,014,890,100	6,191,544,000
Sept. 30, 1916.....	51,086,000,000	12,158,000,000

NOTE.—The figures relate to the Empire only, the debt of the various States not being included. As some of the war charges are borne by the States, the figures do not include the total war debt. According to a declaration made in the Reichstag by the undersecretary of the treasury, the war expenditure of Germany amounts to about 100,000,000 marks a day. Prof. Jaffe has calculated that by the end of July, 1917, the debts of the Empire may reach 120,000,000,000 marks.

The mark has been converted at the rate of 23.8 cents. In the international exchange the mark is now quoted at a discount of about 40 per cent.

AUSTRIA—PUBLIC DEBT.

	Kronen.	Dollars.
Jan. 1, 1914.....	12,608,202,000	2,559,546,000
June 30, 1916.....	35,027,834,685	7,313,650,000
Jan. 1, 1917.....	44,226,919,541	8,978,065,000

NOTE.—The official figure of debt for January 1, 1917, includes 12,837,890,228 kronen of ordinary debt and 31,389,029,316 kronen of war debt. The krone has been converted at the rate of 20.3 cents. It is now at a discount of about 50 per cent in international exchange. During 1916 the daily expenditure of Austria was 41.6 million kronen, and a parliamentary committee estimated that the debt would reach 55,000,000,000 kronen by the end of June, 1917. The debt statement is exclusive of paper money.

HUNGARY—PUBLIC DEBT.

	Kronen.	Dollars.
Jan. 1, 1913.....	6,592,846,000	1,338,348,000
Jan. 1, 1917.....	24,557,636,000	4,995,200,000

NOTE.—The figure of debt for January 1, 1917, is approximate only. It has been calculated by adding an amount equal to somewhat less than three-fifths of the Austrian war debt to the amount shown for January 1, 1913. Austria and Hungary contribute to the common military expenditures in the proportion of 63.6 to 36.4, and the estimate of the Hungarian war debt is based on that proportion.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman speaks of the regular annual appropriations—

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. When the gentleman speaks of appropriations.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Six billions estimates in round numbers are to be considered by the House with a billion and a half in round numbers within the last two weeks, war expenditures of course.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, in conclusion, unless some other gentlemen want to ask questions—and I want to be courteous, but I wish to close as quickly as possible—

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MORGAN. I am much interested in the question of whether the interest on this new bond issue should be raised from 3½ to 4 per cent. Does the gentleman think it is wise to increase the interest rate from 3½ to 4 per cent?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, I do not think so; yet under the terms of this bill it must be so or the bonds can not be sold. I stated—perhaps I had better explain that matter. For instance, the bonds already authorized and sold carry a rate of interest of 3½ per cent per annum and are exempt from taxation. These bonds authorized by this bill are to carry an interest rate of 4 per cent per annum and are subject to all supertaxes—not subject to normal taxes—but subject to all supertaxes.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, then, it is a fact that the bond proposition submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury of $2,000,000,000 was oversubscribed by a billion dollars, and that was a 3½ per cent bond?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Now what evidence has the Secretary or the committee that the Government could not sell bonds at 3½ per cent interest rate? Is that a matter of mere conjecture, or what is the evidence on that point?

Mr. FORDNEY. In short, to be blunt, gentlemen, it is the opinion of the representatives of this Government that the Government will get a greater amount of taxes out of the people who have their money invested in bonds if you make them taxable and carry the additional one-half of 1 per cent per annum—that the Government will get more money back in taxes in proportion to the additional interest charged on the bond of one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it not a fact, if the Government issues bonds at 4 per cent, that will to some extent destroy the value of railroad, industrial, city, State, and municipal bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think so; and I explained that, probably, before the gentleman came in. Let me give an illustration: Suppose you take a very wealthy man—a Standard Oil man whose income is very great, one of the greatest in the country—and he should invest a very large amount of money in these bonds at the interest rate of 4 per cent—he, if anybody in the country, is subject to supertax, and therefore he purchases a Government bond bearing a rate of interest of 4 per cent and comes within the limit of the payment of supertax on very great incomes—his investment is worth but 1½ per cent per annum on the Government bond, which will not be attractive to that class of money lender.

Mr. MORGAN. Is it not a fact that the object of making these bonds subject to the supertax is to prevent or prohibit men of large means from buying those bonds? In other words, does not the Secretary of the Treasury think that those bonds should be sold to the mass of the people and not to the rich people or to the banks?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether it is his intention or not, that is exactly the effect it will have, without any doubt whatever in my mind.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman spoke about the great interest charge which has come to us. If we increase the rate now to 4 per cent, is it not possible the next issue will have 4½ per cent, and is it not a fact that the moneyed interests generally are always saying that we have got to increase the rate on these bonds, and will it not have that tendency?

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman was not on the floor when I stated that during the Civil War the rate of interest on the various loans ran from 7½ on the first loans down to 5 per cent before the close of the Civil War. Now, this question came up before the Committee on Ways and Means, and I believe it was understood by all that we are not going to hereafter agree to increase the rate of interest on future bond issues above 4 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. Now let me inquire of the gentleman with reference to his statement that during the Civil War we paid in excess of 7 per cent as the rate of interest, and from there it ran down. I think the gentleman's explanation of that is not correct. My idea is that when the Civil War began this Nation was without credit, and it was a question of whether we could continue the war; but as the war went on the Federal Government became better organized and established a better credit, and that was the reason why we got credit. But a different rule will follow in this war. Here we started out when our best credit was when the war began, and as these debts increase and expenses go on you will find the interest rate will increase and the credit will decrease instead of increasing, on account of the great volume of bonds we are bound to issue.

Mr. FORDNEY. It was for the cause I have stated, and I will state it for the gentleman's benefit again. The first issue of bonds during the Civil War carried a rate of interest of 7.3 per cent. The second rate of interest was 7 per cent, 6 per cent, and finally 5 per cent. All of those bonds were short-time bonds, and right after the Civil War they were converted into long-time bonds carrying an interest rate of 6 per cent per annum.

Now, gentlemen, let me close. Let me say with all seriousness that we have without scarcely a blush authorized the President to summon 10,000,000 of the flower of American youth for our Army and our Navy, to be sacrificed, if need be, and although taxes are to our people unpleasant and in some instances a hardship, the time is at hand for the Congress of the United States to summon large sums of the Nation's wealth to promote, equip, and sustain our Army and our Navy in the field of battle.

Never while an American patriot survives or a dollar of this Nation's great wealth remains unexpended to maintain the dearly bought heritage of our fathers should we cease to defend that heritage with our wealth and with our lives. [Applause.] I have three sons, and I have contributed two already. Let us hope and pray God may speedily bring to an early conclusion, without bloodshed, this dreadful war. Let us give freely of our wealth unhesitatingly to strengthen our allies in a foreign land that they may bear the brunt of this war, not brought on by us but by them, and bring it to a hasty conclusion.

I thank you. [Applause.]

I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Moore].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not advised that the gentleman from Michigan can yield time.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say that it was agreed upon by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and myself at the beginning that, although the request was not made as to controlling the time by either him or myself, it was generally understood it would be controlled either by the gentleman from North Carolina or myself, and the time for anyone who was present to object was then and not now.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is not acquainted with the rules of the House or else he would not make that statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. I made the statement exactly as it occurred on this floor to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. There was not any such understanding entered into.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the situation, it is possible that the minds of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] met upon the proposition, but no action was taken by the House.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me ask the Chair this question. Did I not ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] when he took the floor to that effect, that he should control one half of the time and that I should control the other half of the time, and he said to let that be understood without any action being taken on the part of the House?

Mr. FOSTER. That is what he said.

Mr. STAFFORD. The fact is the request was never submitted, and the fact is that it could not be in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORDNEY. What does the gentleman wish?

Mr. STAFFORD. I am willing to have the gentleman control the time, but let it be done in a parliamentary way, as it ordinarily is done. There has been no agreement made.

Mr. FORDNEY. Can not the gentleman give unanimous consent now without rising to go back into the House?

Mr. STAFFORD. We can not in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will not the gentleman withhold that request for a moment?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withholds the request for a moment.

Mr. RAINEY. I withdraw the request.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if this great bond bill passes it will not lie in the mouth of any one at home or abroad to say that the Congress of the United States has failed to give ample financial support to the President for the prosecution of the war against the Imperial German Government. Although no gun has been fired since the President proclaimed the existence of a state of war with Germany, large powers and appropriations have already been voted to him, in behalf of this and foreign nations. This bill, which will put the President in position to lend to our allies in Europe and elsewhere a total of $7,000,000,000 and raise additional sums by bond issue for domestic war purposes, will bring the total war expense of the United States, including certain departmental appropriations, up to a grand total for the fiscal year ending June 30 next, of more than $19,000,000,000. This is a per capita charge of $190 upon the population of this country for a war in which we have been legislatively engaged for the short period of five months. It represents a financial responsibility for this period equal to about four times the actual amount of money in circulation in the whole country.

If there has been any delay on the part of Congress in giving the President this exceptional authority to use the blood and treasure of the United States to fight a war with Germany and to cooperate with the allies, it might be edifying and satisfactory to the masses of the American people if some of our foreign critics who were insistent for American participation in the war, or some of the metropolitan editors who have echoed their sentiments, would point out wherein any other country has been more prompt or more generous under conditions so suddenly and unexpectedly thrust upon it. The way is open for a public comparison of data and figures if any critic of the American Congress cares to avail himself of it.

It will be remembered that Congress was called into extraordinary session in April last, after the country had been led to believe the United States would be kept out of war. During the fateful five months intervening from that time to this, the President's war message has been followed up by appropriations approximating $9,000,000,000. The country has been whipped into shape for war by the conscription of hundreds of thousands of industrious young Americans who have been and are now being called from their usual avocations to take their places in the training camps of the Army and Navy preparatory to foreign service. All American business has endured unusual financial tests; and the American home, already suffering from excessive prices for food supplies, has been more or less disorganized by the departure of single and married men for service in the field. In addition to this, the peace-loving and peace-deserving Americans, through their Congress, have added enormously to their Military and Naval Establishments; they have provided loans to foreign Governments at war with Germany; have established war-risk insurance to protect foreign commerce, as well as our own; have set up an extensive aviation service to operate principally on foreign soil; and have mobilized American men and industries to a degree unheard of in the history of the country.

The cost of all this to the individual American citizen has been higher and more oppressive than ever in our history. In the brief period since the President's war message the country has also invoked the practical and volunteer services of its women, who have made unusual sacrifices and engaged in unusual occupations in order that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States might not be impeded in the great work he has undertaken to do.

These are some of the instrumentalities which Congress and the country have already employed to uphold American honor and to give aid to the allies.

Now comes the second bond bill, the greatest in financial import ever presented to this or any other legislative body. It is such a bill as once thoroughly analyzed by the average American citizen will bring home to him impressively the weight of his own responsibility in this war. When he does come to analyze it and realizes that it is but the beginning of what Lord Northcliffe, the British commissioner to the United States declared last week would be "a long and costly war," he will better understand why the Representatives of the people of the United States should not only aid the President to start the war effectively, but should also undertake to see that while American rights are being maintained abroad they shall also be preserved at home. And such domestic rights may be taken to include a fair and just taxation to support the actual and reasonable demands of war.

The speed with which a government can plunge its people into obligations that endure long after war is familiar to those who have studied history. Already in this war rumors of waste and extravagance, due to the haste of preparation for an early and effective war, persist in finding their way into print. The American taxpayers have a right to be protected against excessive burdens which such unpatriotic practices impose. With the passage of this bill, bringing the total expenditures up to the enormous figure of more than $19,000,000,000, with almost unlimited discretion conferred upon subordinates through the delegation of power by the President, it is not extraordinary that mistakes will occur, for which the people will have to pay, or that the profiteer will get in his deadly work. It is certainly not giving "comfort to the enemy" at this particular stage of the discussion to observe that those who sometimes most vociferously criticize the Representatives who feel their responsibility to the taxpayers in this regard are conspicuous amongst those who make mistakes affecting the life and property of the citizen, or who find it profitable to keep the country at war. The passage of this bill, whether it is so accepted by the habitual critics of Congress or not, will be the most effective response that Congress can give as to its readiness to support the Commander in Chief. It will answer those amongst our allies who have shown a spirit of restiveness toward the Congress of the United States, and it will put Germany upon notice that the resolution of Congress was no idle declaration of war, but means business, no matter what the immediate or ultimate sacrifice. But it should avail nothing to the grafter, nor should it be used to excuse the incompetent or the wasteful.

To me, Mr. Speaker, it seems fair that we should tell the American people, so far as our voices will carry, that even this $19,000,000,000 entry into the European war is only a beginning. The President's recent reply to the Pope's peace memorial helped to arouse the American people on that point. It convinced those who read it that the task which the President has set, to practically overthrow the Imperial Government of Germany, will call for new and continued sacrifices which those who had hoped for an early peace must now endure to the end.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I see the gentleman from Pennsylvania places a construction upon the President's demand for overturning the German Government. Is the gentleman able to say what the attitude of the other powers, such as Great Britain and France, is upon that specific proposition?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Their replies to the Pope's peace proposition have not yet been published. The President has given utterance to his thoughts on the subject, and we are informed through the newspapers that his may be the last word, so far as the allied powers are concerned.

Mr. SLOAN. I call the attention of the gentleman to the recent speech of Lloyd George, disclaiming the intention of overthrowing the present German Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I take it that the President's message meant that there could be no peace with Germany until the present German Government was changed by the people themselves. In other words, there would have to be a change in the imperialistic system which now prevails in that country, and the answer to that proposition must come from the German people. That is as I understood it.

Mr. SLOAN. I was interested in the gentleman's construction of the message of the President as it measured against the statement of Lloyd George and Balfour.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania consider the answer that came from the Reichstag as an answer coming from the German people?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not so understand the President's letter in response to the Pope's proposition; but I do understand the President to mean—and I hesitate to interpret his language—that there must be a change in the present form of government in Germany before the American Nation can enter into peace negotiations.

A remarkable interview interpreting the President's utterances, and given to the press by the English commissioner, Lord Northcliffe, confirms this view. Of Lord Northcliffe, whose prestige as a publisher is not confined to Great Britain, a writer in Everybody's Magazine in April last, said:

When the real story of how the British cause was brought home to the American public is told, it will be found that Northcliffe's service to our writing men and women has aided more than nearly all the official agencies combined.

The same Lord Northcliffe, now cooperating with the United States Government in the matter of loans, food distribution, shipping, and so forth, seated in his New York office last week, gave warning to the American people that they were now "in for a long and costly war." In the course of his interview, reported by Mr. Richard J. Beamish, Lord Northcliffe, speaking of President Wilson's ultimatum to the Pope, said:

"If the ultimatum can be brought home to Germany, a great change will be worked in the thought, temper, and the future of the German race. Do you know that only one leading paper in Germany has printed that portion of the President's address to Congress at the beginning of the war in which he set the German people apart from the Kaiser?"

"The note to the Pope closes the door in the face of peace negotiations at this time. Americans who will study that note must realize they are in for a long and costly war."

"And what do you think about a long war?" I asked.

"I have a theory," he replied after a pause for meditation, "that a long war after all may be best for the world, best for civilization."

"That is a surprising statement," I interjected. "What are your reasons?"

"The elements that go to make this war have been brewing a long time. There has been in Germany so much preparation outside of the matter of armies and navies, so many factors that require decision, so many problems that need solution, that a period of ferment, such as war is, will perhaps be to the greatest advantage. There are so many complexes in Germany requiring disintegration that it is just as well to make haste efficiently and slowly."

"What do you think of our handling of the war?"

"To me and to many other British subjects the amount of work that you have already accomplished is, without exception, remarkable. Often I hear it said of the President by Englishmen, 'How on earth did he get these people into the war?' We Britishers look along Broadway and see scarcely a British name. We go down into the east side of New York and hear Greek and other languages spoken rather than English. We see the same phenomenon in Central Park and other parts of the city. These people are in the war, and they are being daily awakened to the realities of warfare. There is a driving force back of the people, and that force comes from the instinct of self-defense. America is in the war to stay, and that is what the note to the Pope means, and that is what the American people will learn with increasing force day by day."

Parenthetically, I may remark that Lord Northcliffe visited the Secretary of the Treasury recently to confer about another loan to Great Britain; and I may also say, parenthetically, that the Secretary of the Treasury, before the Committee on Ways and Means, said in answer to questions on this subject of loans that he was not sure that the four billions that we are to lend to our allies would be sufficient to carry them up to the 30th of June next. It is possible they may need more, although it is also possible they may not need so much. The Secretary was noncommittal as to whether we would have to raise more money to carry them beyond June 30 next.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman says the Secretary was noncommittal as to whether we would not have to raise more money to carry them to before that time?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was noncommittal as to that. The Secretary said he did not know what new demands might be made. He could not, of course, say when the war would end.

Mr. Chairman, since the position of Lord Northcliffe as commissioner to the United States is official, and his influence at Washington and in the newspaper world in the United States and Europe is unique, the effect of his conclusions may not be minimized or mistaken. From the British viewpoint Lord Northcliffe "speaks by the card." If he accurately estimated the President's ultimatum on the peace proposal—and no official suggestion has come to Congress that we should cease to make loans and appropriations to perpetuate America's part in the European war—it may be accepted as a foregone conclusion that the regular session of Congress beginning in December next will be called upon to extend our present $19,000,000,000 cost to higher amounts not yet estimated.

I assume, Mr. Chairman, the people of the United States will patriotically comply with every obligation which the President and Congress impose upon them to win this war; but if it is true that we are "in for a long and costly war," and we begin our part of it with $19,000,000,000 of American obligations, is it not fair to our own people, and to our allies as well, that we take an early account of their war stock and of ours? If we begin with Great Britain, the greatest of the foreign nations with whom we are now cooperating, the contrast will be interesting. Data compiled by the Department of Commerce and submitted to the Ways and Means Committee shows that the public debt of Great Britain March 31, 1914, was $3,443,799,000; that one year later, March 31, 1915, after the war had started, it had advanced to $5,673,374,000, a matter of only $2,200,000,000 in one whole year; and that more than three years later, July 21, 1917, the interim being war years, it had increased to $21,897,666,000, or only about $2,900,000,000 more than the United States war cost, including loans, provided for in five months. The department data submitted to the committee shows that Great Britain's debt included advances to her allies and to British dominions of an equivalent of $5,800,000,000. If paid, these advances would reduce the total British debt for a war of more than three years to an amount below the indebtedness now being incurred by the United States for its five months' participation in the war.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. Is that true, according to your figures, deducting the $7,000,000,000, that we are proposing to loan out of our expenditures to our allies? The gentleman's argument I did not think was fair, in that it did not bring out that thought.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I left the figures stand partly because it was represented to the committee that we should leave it discretionary about the payment of the obligations we are taking from foreign nations, but I am happy to state that the committee in this bill has indicated that it expects these loans made to our allies to be repaid. [Applause.] With that explanation the analysis stands.

Mr. CRISP. But if their obligations are paid it does not stand, and the presumption is that they will be paid, and they will be paid unless Congress by a subsequent act relieves them from payment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When the first bond bill was under consideration gentlemen on the floor of the House said that they would be willing to have these obligations canceled, and the department's attitude to a certain extent has left that question open. But it has been written differently in the bill now before the House. I concede if the foreign bonds are paid it reduces our total indebtedness that much, but nevertheless we incur the indebtedness.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman know how much money Great Britain has raised by taxation during this period as compared with her bonded indebtedness?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not those figures. It may be that Great Britain's debt is higher than I am now stating it. It probably is.

Mr. MADDEN. They raised about $5,000,000,000 in taxes, including those for war purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. These figures I am using may not be the latest figures, but they come from the Department of Commerce and serve to show that the United States up to date is certainly "doing its bit."

Mr. MADDEN. Great Britain has raised $5,000,000,000, or a little more, I understand, including taxation for all purposes.

Mr. HUSTED. And if that is true, she has raised by bonded indebtedness about four times more than she has raised by taxation.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may be. I intend to speak about bonds and taxation.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The figures that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] gives are up to April of the present fiscal year.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Each gentleman may have his own figures, but those I quote come from the Department of Commerce of the United States.

Now, as to France. The public debt of France, as reported to the committee by the same department, was $6,347,540,000 January 1, 1914, before the war started, but jumped rapidly until April 30, 1917, when the total was $17,727,013,000. This huge indebtedness of France, where most of the hard fighting has been done, is less for the three years than the five months' cost to the United States, and it included loans of nearly 4,000,000,000 francs to allied countries.

The Russian debt as reported to the committee began at $4,544,000,000 January 1, 1914, and hovered round about $13,000,000,000 January 1, 1917.

The Russian debt is undoubtedly greater to-day, but to a certain extent the situation has been relieved by loans authorized by the American Congress.

The debt of Italy, which has been putting up such a spirited fight against Austria in recent weeks, was quoted at $2,792,106,000 as of June 30, 1914, and had risen to $6,067,600,000 January 1, 1917. It has doubtless increased considerably since that date.

Taken separately these figures for the dates stated, with the possible exception of Great Britain, show the expenditures of each foreign nation to be less than those thus far authorized by the United States. The aggregated foreign cost for the allies for the period referred to in round figures was about $58,000,000,000.

The German and Austrian figures present a startling contrast. Up to September 30, 1916, according to the Department of Commerce, the public debt of Germany, which has been sustaining the brunt of war against all the allied nations, was only $12,158,000,000. Prof. Jaffe, it was reported, has calculated that by the end of July, 1917, the debts of the empire would reach about 120,000,000,000 marks, or double the 1916 figures. But the German total of $12,158,000,000 to sustain a war against an approximate $58,000,000,000 of contending nations is what surprises us. It furnishes food for thought to Americans who are now expected to supply the sinews of war for themselves and the allies. If it is true that Germany has been using large sums of money to corrupt public sentiment and maintain an expensive spy system in America, in China, and in other countries, that of itself would seem to materially reduce the comparatively small war bill just quoted. As to Austria's debt, on January 1, 1914, it was quoted at $2,559,546,000, which had risen to $8,978,065,000 January 1, 1917. This of course should be added to Germany's total, as against the $58,000,000,000 total of the allies.

War-debt figures for Japan, another of the allies at war with Germany, were not submitted to the committee, but incidentally the Secretary of the Treasury stated that our commercial transactions with Japan were now leading much American gold out of the United States to that country. Japan, it may be observed, has not been overlooking her interest in commerce during the war, and has been steadily developing her ship lines on the Pacific Ocean and elsewhere.

And this reference to Japan, Mr. Chairman, is not invidious at all. In the matter of commerce after the war, each of the allied nations to which we are now making loans is equally concerned. It is quite natural that all of them should be anxious about their future participation in the world's trade. We of the United States also have an interest in this question and should not be sidetracked through commercial or financial impulses so generous in war times as to leave us hindmost in competition when peace is restored.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not the very high disproportion of cost on the part of the United States in conducting this war as compared with the expenses borne by other nations very largely the price that we are compelled to pay for our lack of military preparedness in this country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is something in that, and I will concede that perhaps the low cost in Germany is due to previous preparation. That may be true; but that does not alter the fact that a condition now prevails which should put the United States people on guard as to their ability to compete in the great commercial warfare which they may be forced to face when peace has been restored.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TEMPLE. I thought I noticed that in comparing the expenditures of the United States so far with those of other powers the gentleman stated that $19,000,000,000 had been expended in five months?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I did not say that. I said that we had already appropriated or prepared to appropriate in our five months' war period $19,000,000,000.

Mr. TEMPLE. And does not include the total expense up to the 30th of June?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The loans to the allies are to be carried forward to the 30th of June, 1918, the end of the fiscal year; but as we have been chided sometimes, and sometimes from the other side of the water, about our lack of haste to precipitate ourselves into the war, I wanted to show that in five months we have appropriated and made provision for substantially as large an indebtedness as England incurred during the whole three years of the war and more than France or Russia throughout the war.

Mr. TEMPLE. The gentleman, however, would distinguish between appropriating money and providing for the sale of bonds?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes. I will speak of that later.

Mr. TEMPLE. We have not appropriated all of this $19,000,000,000.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; not yet. But if the loans which we have made to foreign Governments are not paid the people of the United States will have to pay these and other obligations up to the total of the $19,000,000,000. I assume the loans will be paid, most of them.

Mr. TEMPLE. Is not the gentleman including in his $19,000,000,000 the amount now proposed to be raised by the pending bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am including in the $19,000,000,000 the appropriations already made and the amounts reported by the Ways and Means Committee herein.

Mr. TEMPLE. And besides that—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It includes what is to be expended for loans to our allies and for our own necessities up to the end of the fiscal year June 30 next. We are assuming the total debt now.

Mr. TEMPLE. But the gentleman would not say the money is appropriated, because we have not appropriated it; and he would not say it is for five months, because it is intended to carry us to the end of the fiscal year, which is 15 months.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would not say we have been in this war 15 months?

Mr. TEMPLE. We have not, but if it is fair to say that the money has been spent—

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There may have been a public impression that we were in this war. That perhaps is a part of the trouble; but the President's declaration of a state of war was not ratified by Congress until the first week of April of the present year—about five months ago.

Mr. TEMPLE. But the $19,000,000,000 are not for expenditures within five months, but for loans to our allies and for expenditures for 15 months.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As I said at the outstart, they include certain departmental appropriations, and they include the total of the loans, and they are the aggregate that this Congress has provided to meet war conditions up to the 30th of June, 1918. But we have been at war only five months.

Mr. LOBECK. But whenever Congress appropriates money, that money is credited to the department that is to use the money.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly, and a great deal of this money is being very rapidly expended now.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is not making these comparisons for the purpose of showing that this Government is making appropriations that it ought not to make for this war, is he?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I am showing that this Congress, which has been accused of sloth, is almost unduly hasty in its desire to help the allies and to impose taxes upon the people of the United States.

Mr. GARNER. But the gentleman has no criticism to make up to date of the appropriations that have been made by Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am asserting what seems to be the fact, that we are liberal and quite generous, and I am calling to the attention of the American people, so far as I can, the fact that the burden is upon them, and that it will have to be paid, if not by this generation, then by future generations; and that this is only the beginning of what Lord Northcliffe says is to be "a long and costly war."

Mr. Chairman, the obligations we are incurring if indulged to an unreasonable degree and without proper oversight and supervision by the Representatives of the people in Congress, may seriously handicap our future generations in the world's work they will have to do. It is no secret that Japan is rapidly increasing her world's commerce. It is to be assumed that sooner or later the industries of Great Britain and of Germany and of France will be shoving their output into foreign markets. Canada, our sister ally to the north, is certainly not letting any of her opportunities slip on account of the war. She is actually offering inducements to business men and capitalists to locate over there. If we repeal our coastwise shipping laws Canada will be in fine feather. Canada did not even pass a conscription law to help the European allies until after the United States had done so. These are some of the matters we should consider along with the bond and taxation burdens we are called upon to discuss. Remember that neither Germany nor Great Britain have sustained such great losses in merchant vessels as to make this suggestion unworthy.

As to Great Britain, she unquestionably continues to maintain her claim of "Mistress of the Seas." It may be a necessary expedient of war, but it is somewhat humiliating nevertheless, that the British control of shipping has largely regulated and restricted American imports and exports throughout the war period. The British Textile Alliance is still doing business in this country and through it American importers and exporters are expected to make their shipments and incidentally to pay their charges. Consider these matters in connection with the recent statement of Mr. Bonar Law, chancellor of the exchequer, as to the enormous and seemingly unwarranted profits accruing to the stockholders of certain British shipping companies, and it seems fair to inquire why the submarine menace has so long been tolerated. Is it due to the more important commercial interests, or is the great British Navy waiting for the Navy of the United States to undertake the job?

During the discussion of the finance bill in the British Parliament late in July, Mr. Law, relating his personal experience as a minor shipowner, is reported to have said that "he had invested $40,550 in 15 different shipping companies managed by 7 distinct owners. He would have been satisfied with 5 per cent interest, or slightly over $2,000. His actual profits were: 1915, $18,120; 1916, $19,235. This was after paying excess-profits tax. In addition, one of the steamers was either sold or sunk. His investment in the ship was about $1,000. The check he received in liquidation of claim against the ship was $5,000."

Another statement showing that British merchant vessels have been paying well during the war is shown by the Furness-Withy report, which I quote herewith:

"Report for the year ending April 30 last, a profit of £1,183,000 after paying two years' unstated excess-profits tax. The dividend declared is 20 per cent, the same as the previous year. A sum of £350,000 is placed to depreciation and £700,000 to a trades contingency fund, making the total reserve £1,500,000. Other small allocations leave a balance of £136,000."

When foreign nations supposed to be in desperate straits because of the German submarine are able to show such fine commercial returns as these reports indicate, it is no wonder that some American newspapers have begun to inquire why the British Admiralty has not given more attention to the submarine menace. And, by the same token, it may be fair for American taxpayers, who are now bonding themselves and the future generations, to inquire why American money is to be put into wooden ships, or even steel ships for that matter, to run the gantlet of the submarine, or why there is not a closer cooperation as between the American Navy and foreign admiralities with respect to the suppression of the submarine.

In connection with these suggestions of the interest of some of our allies in the preservation of their own domestic affairs it may not be amiss to remind ourselves that we have established; amongst other things, largely for the benefit of our allies, a food and fuel control establishment in the United States which proposes to check monopoly, but which also promises to keep consumers' prices in this country as high, if not higher, than those which now exist in foreign countries. I cite these facts merely to show that up to date the United States has been fairly generous to her allies and has assumed responsibilities and granted concessions which ought not to be made too heavy and too enduring a burden upon our own people.

Mr. Chairman, we have now reached a point with our American expenditures where we should temper some of the discretion which we have been reposing in our administrative officers to the cooperation and the supervision of Congress. If Lord Northcliffe is right when he says the United States is "in for a long and costly war," the burdens are going to pile up enormously notwithstanding the temporary war prosperity which now prevails in the United States. Taxes or loans, it makes no difference, the people must pay in the end. If taxes are imposed, as they will be when the revenue bill passes, the burden will be felt immediately. If we resort to loans, as this bill proposes to do, future generations will assist in carrying the burden. The loan situation is anomalous in this—and the distinguished Speaker of the House made the same comment a while ago in his interrogation of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]—that the debts we now create by loans for future generations to pay will be borne in part by the very young men whom we are now sending forth to battle. It will be theirs not only "to do and die," but to pay the bills, those of them who do not die, when they come home.

If the revenue bill, which is now undergoing the scrutiny of the Senate, carries in excess of $2,000,000,000, which is likely, it would take nine more such tax bills to pay the United States war bill for the current year. The revenue bill is a tax bill. It touches the pocketbooks and profits of the present generation. That is why it is so hard to pass. The present bill is a loan bill. It carries five times the amount of the single revenue bill, which is making so much ado in the Senate; but the burden is passed along to future generations. The difference is that a tax bill is a sort of C. O. D. arrangement and a loan bill is a promise to pay. The ease with which loan bills are passed does not lessen the force of the suggestion that the American people should be more fully informed about these large financial operations.

I expect to vote for the present bond bill because it was represented to the Ways and Means Committee to be absolutely necessary to keep the faith of the Nation thus far made with our allies and to adequately support the President acting in the capacity of Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. The administration, of course, is responsible for the conduct of the war and makes these demands upon Congress for reasons satisfactory to itself. While it would be unwise at this time to throw any obstacles in the way of the President or to make more onerous the great task he has assumed, I am still of opinion that he would be neither hampered nor hobbled by the appointment of a joint committee of Congress to cooperate with him and with his heads of departments, to promote efficiency and to prevent waste and extravagance in the matter of war expenditures.

Unless Congress does appoint some such committee, which may be accepted in good faith by the President, there will ultimately be little or no limit upon the discretion of administrative officers with respect to the expenditure of public funds.

This bill proposes to authorize the loan of $4,000,000,000 to our allies. Does Congress receive any information as to how these loans are made, to whom, or upon what grounds, except through the newspapers? Granted that the Secretary of the Treasury did appear before the Ways and Means Committee and did discuss these matters within such bounds as he thought proper, but still much of this information is denied to Congress itself through a careful pruning of the stenographers' notes, due doubtless to a desire to conserve the public interest.

The rate of interest which makes this new bond issue more attractive to investors whose money is thus withdrawn from the industries to a certain extent is raised by this bill from 3½ to 4 per cent. That fixes a heavier burden upon the future generations and is estimated to create a new charge on interest account alone of $300,000,000 per annum. This sum must be raised by taxation. Another feature of this bill, apart from the generous bestowal of authority upon the present Secretary of the Treasury and his successors, who may be less informed than he, is the allowance of approximately $17,000,000—originally $23,000,000 was asked for—to pay for advertising and promoting the loan. With that enormous sum of money at his disposal for promotion purposes some future Secretary, less scrupulous than the distinguished incumbent of that office, could establish such an organization for partisan or other selfish purposes as might induce the lamented Andrew Jackson to rise from his grave and call Nicholas Biddle, of the United States Bank, a mere tyro or "piker" in finance.

It is to be presumed, of course, that the President will perform his full duty to the people of the United States in these troublous times and that the heads of departments acting under his direction will honestly and efficiently expend the public money. But if "we are in for a long and costly war," and there is to be no compromise until the Imperial Government of Germany is wiped out, and Congress is to remain in continuous session to raise money by loans and taxation, it does not seem unreasonable nor lacking the proper American spirit to ask that the Representatives of the people, upon whom this taxing function is fixed, be permitted for their own satisfaction and for that of their constituents to know how the people's money is being spent. To bring this matter before the House for consideration I have introduced a bill providing for the appointment of a joint committee on war expenditures, which I shall offer as an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. Chairman, before taking my seat I desire to add a few words to what was said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] about the advisability of creating a joint congressional committee on war expenditures.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Before the gentleman goes into that I wish to ask, Has anything been fixed with regard to the payment for newspaper advertising for the promotion of the next loan?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary of the Treasury was asked about that, and there was submitted to him a newspaper statement which indicated that a press association had proposed to do this work for from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000. Another press association has been advertising in Washington during the last few days that it was necessary to advertise this loan in order to place it; but the Secretary was somewhat discreet in his answers to the question put to him on this subject. He indicated that advertising would be helpful.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I notice in the report that the Secretary says that a commission will have to be paid. He says that the banks and authorities who handled the last loan advertised and used the clerks free of charge, and it would not be fair to ask the banks to do that again.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary was pressed for information on that subject.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. He admits that the newspapers gave their columns free, and says that the same argument would apply to them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Secretary stated that many newspapers gave free notices urging the people to support the loan. He stated that many banks and financial agents gave voluntary and free service, and had held their clerks over-hours, paid for extra meals in order that the extra work imposed upon them might be properly performed, and that the loans were circulated among the patrons of the institutions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the bill is passed, it is left in the hands of the Treasurer as to how it shall be paid.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The original bill carried a provision that no commission should be paid for selling the bonds. This bill leaves out that provision, and the Secretary explained why. In brief, the point was this: The Secretary had called upon bankers and brokerage concerns and other agents for selling bonds to help him in the great work of placing the liberty loan. He called upon the newspapers in the same way. The Secretary now feels, according to the statement to the committee, that it would be fair to compensate, not to pay a commission, because "commission" is an undesirable word, but to compensate those whose services he invoked in all quarters of the country to help place the new loan.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And, instead of a commission, he is allowed a sum for selling the bonds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. As it reads now, the bill will permit the Secretary to use a total of $17,000,000. Originally a percentage rate was asked for which would equal $23,000,000, but that was cut down on a motion made by the gentleman from Nebraska, so that the total now allowed by the bill would be $17,000,000, which I myself think is too much, to be very frank with the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand that when the gentleman was younger he was a newspaper man. Can not he testify to the value of newspaper advertising in a campaign of this kind?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A campaign of newspaper advertising, while expensive, would be very effective; but the Secretary would have this difficulty in an advertising campaign: There are hundreds of thousands of newspapers in the United States—large and small, daily and weekly and semi-weekly—and every person in the newspaper business would expect to be considered in the matter of advertising if the Secretary had at his disposal so large a fund as $17,000,000. And yet it would be one of the ways by which the loan could be floated.

Now, as to the point made by the gentleman from Michigan about the advisability of having a congressional joint committee of the Senate and House, not to interfere with the President of the United States, not to manage the war, not to take any war business out of his hands but to cooperate with him to prevent waste and extravagance and to promote efficiency. The gentleman from Michigan thought that this would be a good thing, and I think it would be a good thing and an essential thing. The gentleman from Michigan was asked for a specific instance for his belief in the usefulness of such a commission, and made some reference to the purchase of flying machines. I tried to help the gentleman from Michigan from my recollection of what I had seen in the newspapers. I sent to the office and obtained a copy of the New York World of the date of August 27. The New York World is not a newspaper speaking for the party of which I am a member; it is presumably friendly to the present administration; it has been for this war from start to finish, and is for the President from start to finish. So it can not be said that the New York World seeks to impede or hamper the President in his work when it brings forward these specific facts which the gentleman from Michigan did not have at hand and which I did not have at hand at this time.

It is said in this article that a great deal of money is being wasted in the purchase of aeroplanes. Now, it will be recalled that when the $640,000,000 bill was brought into the House the Members were told by members of the House Committee on Military Affairs that they should not ask questions, that it might be giving aid and comfort to the enemy to tell how this great sum was to be spent. My judgment is, that the enemy who grafts upon the Government of the United States in war time is almost as dangerous as the enemy across the water, whom we must meet bayonet to bayonet and gun to gun. [Applause.] But coming to the New York World, the friend of the administration, what does it say about the aeroplane business? It quotes in particular Maj. George H. Brett, now in charge of the purchasing end of the Chief Signal Officer's division of the War Department, and what is Maj. Brett quoted as saying?—

We found that the identical parts we found necessary to buy separately costing $15,000, we could buy assembled in a machine for $6,000, but those were their prices and we had to pay. Then the prices kept increasing until finally the Aircraft Production Board threatened the companies with Government confiscation.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am going to quit in a minute.

Mr. BORLAND. Does not the gentleman's statement indicate that the Aircraft Production Board corrected the very thing he points out?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will put the whole statement in the Record and let it speak for itself.

Mr. BORLAND. The Aircraft Production Board corrected it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will put the whole article in the Record so that the House may understand what the gentleman from Michigan was referring to. If another illustration were wanted, we have that of the defective shells sent to our soldiers in France. The serious consequences resulting from such contracts might not be brought to the attention of the President with that celerity with which injured parties would complain to their Congressmen. In some cases it is clear that soldiers might not care to report as to those who were in authority over them. Contractors involved in such practices would certainly not carry the tale to the President or to the department heads. For these and many other reasons it seems advisable that a joint committee of Congress should be created to cooperate with the President. It may be helpful to him and to the country, and it surely can do no harm. [Applause.]

The flying-craft article from the New York World is as follows:

[From the New York World.]

AIRPLANE MAKERS USE WAR NEED TO "HOLD UP" NATION—"EXTORTIONATE" PROFITS BY CONCERN GIVEN CONTRACTS ON AIR-FLEET PROGRAM ARE EXPOSED BY CLEVELAND LEADER CORRESPONDENT AT WASHINGTON, SOME RUNNING HIGH AS 300 PER CENT—COFFIN, OF DEFENSE COUNCIL, THREATENS PLANTS' SEIZURE—$15,000 PAID FOR AIRPLANE PARTS WHICH IN COMPLETED MACHINES COST BUT $6,000—EVIDENCE ABOUNDS OF BRIBE OFFERS, AND CONGRESS IS EXPECTED TO DEMAND FULL INQUIRY.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, August 27.—1 a. m.

The Cleveland Leader this morning prints the following article by Carl D. Ruth, its staff correspondent at the Capital:

WASHINGTON, August 26.

How huge profits have been reaped by aeroplane manufacturers, companies upon which the United States is dependent for the realization of plans for its $640,000,000 air fleet and the successful prosecution of the war is revealed in figures obtained from Government records in Washington.

So flagrant have been the price-boosting activities of these concerns that the aircraft-production board of the Council of National Defense, of which Howard E. Coffin is chairman, has found it necessary to threaten seizure of the plants.

Although this threat has been effective in substantially lowering prices of airplanes, airplane motors, and parts, this drastic step is still being considered as a protection to the people, whom the war is now costing $24,000,000 a day. Members of Congress who know something of the extent to which the Government has been made the victim of profiteering, not only in aircraft production but on contracts for meats, food supplies, uniforms, band instruments, surgical instruments, tentage, and other equipment for the Army and Navy, are ready for a rigid inquiry. Special attention probably will be given aeroplane contracts if such an investigation is ordered.

"EXTORTIONATE" PRICES.

Here are some of the figures and facts concerning which an explanation will be demanded:

Between September 14, 1916, and May 4, 1917, contracts were let by the Chief Signal Officer of the Army, Brig. Gen. George O. Squier, on recommendation of the Aircraft Production Board of the Council of National Defense, totaling $4,363,756, of which $3,418,921 was for assembled airplanes of various types and sizes and $944,835 went for extra motors, propellers, and other parts.

According to Maj. George H. Brett, now in charge of the purchasing end of the Chief Signal Officer's Division of the War Department, the prices charged on many of these contracts were so excessive as to amount practically to extortion, particularly the prices on extra parts. "We found," he said, "that the identical parts we found necessary to buy separately, costing $15,000, we could buy assembled in a machine for $6,000, but those were their prices and we had to pay. Then the prices kept increasing until finally the Aircraft Production Board threatened the companies with Government confiscation."

That profits on airplane contracts were so alluring that the representatives of certain companies were willing to use corruption and bribery in order to land them was indicated, Maj. Brett said, by offers made him.

GRAFT CHANCES ABOUND.

"There have been plenty of opportunities for dishonest officers to share in the profits of these contracts," he said. "However, I am certain that no Army officer or Government official has done so."

"I have made it a rule to accept not so much as a cigar from representatives of companies we are dealing with."

The following 19 companies, manufacturers of airplanes, airplane parts, and accessories, were awarded during the eight-month period indicated above:

The Curtiss Aeroplane & Manufacturing Co., Buffalo, N. Y.
The Burgess Aeroplane Co., Marblehead, Mass.
The Sturtevant Aeroplane Co., Boston, Mass.
The B. F. Sturtevant Co., Hyde Park, Mass.
The Pacific Aeroplane Products Co., Seattle, Wash.
The L. W. F. Engineering Co., College Point, Long Island, N. Y.
The Wright-Martin Aircraft Corporation, No. 60 Broadway, New York.
The Standard Aeroplane Co., New York and Plainfield, N. J.
The Thomas Bros. Aeroplane Co., Ithaca, N. Y.
The Aero Marine Sales Co., New York (now the Aero Marine & Engineering Co.).
The New York Aeroplane Construction Co., New York.
The Wittman Aircraft Co., New York.
The Eastern Aeroplane Co., New York.
The Heinrich Aeroplane Co., New York.
The French-American Balloon Co., whose contract was transferred to the Connecticut Aircraft Co.
The Glenn-Martin Co., Los Angeles, Cal.
The Murray & Tugurtha Co., South Boston, Mass.
Gallaudet Aircraft Corporation, New York.

Some of these companies, it is said, were unable to participate heavily in the profits because they were mainly "paper" concerns and lacked the facilities to handle large contracts. Other of the smaller companies were satisfied with fair profits.

It was the Curtiss Co., of which Glenn L. Curtiss is head, and the Standard, another of the larger companies, which realized the biggest profits.

CURTIS GETS BIG ORDER.

In the four months between October 18 and February 17, the records show, the Curtiss Co. was awarded nine contracts for airplanes at a total price of $1,509,850 and eight contracts for extra motors and parts totaling $390,715, making a grand total of $1,900,565.

The Standard Co. was awarded five contracts for airplanes and parts totaling $1,062,910, of which $893,100 was for airplanes and $169,810 was for parts.

As indicated by Maj. Brett, who verified all of the contracts, the biggest profits, ranging from 100 to 300 per cent, were made on contracts for extra parts.

The largest single contract awarded the Curtiss Co. was one dated February 17, 1917, order No. 5846, approved by Maj. Charles S. Wallace, since promoted to colonel, calling for 36 airplanes, at $14,000 each, totaling $504,000; 24 extra motors at $6,000 each, and 30 self-starters at $750 each, a grand total of $670,500.

The total cost of the extra motors and self-starters by this contract is thus $166,500, or about a fourth of the total contract price.

Other big Curtiss contracts were awarded at the following figures:

October 18, 1916—Order No. 5620, 36 advance military training biplanes at $8,000, $288,000.
October 30—Order No. 5712, 16 airplanes at $14,000, with 200-horsepower motors, and 14 extra motors at $6,000, $308,000.
October 31—Order No. 5740, 36 advance airplanes at $8,000, $288,000.
November 9—Order No. 5851, 25 extra OX-2 motors at $8,000, $81,000, and parts, $100,337.

The biggest contract awarded the Standard Aeroplane Corporation was approved January 17, 1917, by Maj. Wallace and called for 32 twin-screw military hydroairplanes equipped with Hall-Scott motors, at $21,000, totaling $672,000. These machines actually cost the Government, however, $23,100 each, or a total of $739,000.

Filed with the contract is a letter written December 9 by Harry B. Mingle, president of the company, but listed as of January 22 as a modification of order No. 6093, saying that a change in the type of motors would make necessary an increase of $2,100 in the price of each machine.

BURGESS CONCERN ACCUSED.

Another incident showing how an unsuccessful attempt was made by the Burgess Co., said to be controlled by the Curtiss Co., to hold up the Government for "installation charges" of $250 to $300 each for equipping eight seaplanes with Sperry automatic controlling devices and "remote controls" is shown by official correspondence filed with the contract.

The Sperry Co. had quoted a price of $3,425 per set, including installation. When the Burgess Co. attempted to collect the additional installation charges for themselves the chief signal officer, Maj. Wallace, wrote the company a letter dated February 17, stating the Sperry Co.'s price included installation. "We feel that your charges for installation were based on a misunderstanding," he concluded. The Burgess Co. finally agreed to accept $1 an hour for its installation work.

Another contract, indicating the prices paid for machines, is that awarded the Gallaudet Aircraft Corporation on March 15, 1917, under order No. 6391. It called for four military hydroaeroplanes equipped with Hall-Scott engines, at $31,760, and four wheel-landing gears at $1,750, a total of $134,040.

PRICE ON ORDER FOR MICA DOUBLED BY "AMENDMENT."

Among the contracts for aeroplane accessories concerning which explanations are likely to be asked is one dated May 3, 1917, order No. 7123, by which 500 pounds of 3 by 5 inch mica sheets, all edges clean, was purchased at $12 a pound, or $6,000. The price originally proposed by the American Mica Co. in its bid was $6 a pound, or a total of $3,000.

The only official comment on the price is in a letter from the office of the Chief Signal Officer to the company, which is listed as "Amendment to order 7123." The second paragraph of this letter says:

"The price on 500 pounds of mica covered by this order has been amended to read $12 per pound, making the consideration $6,000 instead of $3,000." The letter is signed by Alvin C. Voris, captain of Signal Corps.

Another contract, dated May 14, 1917, order No. 7648, with the Electrore Manufacturing Co., No. 70 Washington Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., called for 35,000 pigtail insulators at 40 cents and 10,000 clamp insulators at 40 cents, a total of $18,000.

The H. W. Johns-Manville Co., of New York, one of the largest concerns of its kind, bid on the same contract, making a price on 35,000 insulators of 25.65 cents and on 10,000 a price of 27.5 cents. The Johns-Manville Co. said in their bid that if the amount ordered was doubled it would furnish the pigtail insulators at 25 cents and the clamp insulators at 26.9 cents.

On May 4, 1917, the B. F. Sturtevant Co. was awarded by T. F. Hicks, supply officer at the Norfolk Navy Yard, the contract for four turbines at $1,696, eight at $1,591, and four at $1,546, a total of $25,696. In a letter dated April 30 the company said:

"The prices in letter of April 6 were f. o. b. Readville. It dawned on us that this quotation must include delivery to Norfolk, so we ask you to kindly consider the ink figures on one copy of the proposal and that the figures in this letter should apply."

In the requisition filed with the contracts there is no indication of any other figures, ink or otherwise.

On October 23, 1916, under contract No. 27799, Paymaster General McGowan, of the Navy, awarded the Sturtevant Co. a contract for six airplanes to cost $4,800 each, and six airpower planes to cost $3,950 each, a total of $52,500. On November 13, however, a supplementary contract was awarded the same company calling for $3,000 additional on the same machines.

In an affidavit filed with this supplementary contract Paymaster McGowan said it was awarded "for equipping the six aeroplanes covered in the original contract with model 5-A aluminum cylinder motors in lieu of the motors specified in the original contract. The additional cost of each motor is $500."

Wrist watches and field glasses for American aviators were also provided for in contracts awarded by the Chief Signal Officer through Maj. Wallace.

In February, 1917, order No. 6490, Henry Freund & Co., No. 65 Nassau Street, New York, was awarded a contract for 1,000 wrist watches at $6.75—a total of $6,750.

The Knickerbocker Watch Co., Woolworth Building, New York, bid on several grades of these watches at prices ranging from $3.15 to $4.25 each, and the Ingersoll Watch Co., New York, bid $2.75 each on its "radio-light" watches, with a trade discount of 15 per cent, besides 1 per cent for payment within 10 days. The contract, however, went to Freund & Co.

For 13,000 field glasses two contracts approved by Maj. Wallace called for the expenditure of $432,250 to one concern—the Bausch & Lomb Optical Co. One dated January 26 called for 5,000 field glasses at $33.25, totaling $166,250; while the other, dated March 2, called for 8,000 at the same price, totaling $266,000.

Contracts were also awarded for cameras, which are necessary for military observation aviators. On February 19, 1917, under order No. 6602, Maj. Wallace awarded to Arthur Brock, of Philadelphia, a contract for 50 cameras and supplies totaling $26,846. Forty-two of the cameras were of a type patented by Brock. Bids on some of the cameras and much of the equipment were filed by the Eastman Kodak Co., of Rochester, N. Y., at lower prices. According to Maj. Brett they were not of the type desired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 5901, had come to no resolution thereon.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order for Calendar Wednesday, to-morrow, may be dispensed with and that this bill (H. R. 5901) be in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the business on Calendar Wednesday for to-morrow be dispensed with and that the House proceed with the bill under consideration (H. R. 5901). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUSE OF MEETING.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold that objection. We will have to lose a half hour or an hour to-morrow on account of the appearance before the House of the Japanese mission.

Mr. MADDEN. We will have from 12 o'clock until 5 or 6, and I think that is long enough.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, September 5, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Acting Commissioner of Internal Revenue relative to an appropriation for remodeling the interior of the New York customhouse to meet the requirements of the internal-revenue force (H. Doc. No. 357), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. DOOLITTLE: A bill (H. R. 5916) to exempt certain persons from military service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KEHOE: A bill (H. R. 5917) to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DENT: A bill (H. R. 5918) to authorize the President to organize provisionally as Field Artillery or Infantry, and to use as Field Artillery or Infantry during the existing emergency, such regiments of Cavalry as he may designate; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BLAND: A bill (H. R. 5919) authorizing the President to acquire or construct freight cars for the transportation of coal and other products and commodities and making an appropriation therefor; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DENT: Resolution (H. Res. 133) providing for an investigation of the Ordnance Department of the War Department; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 147) authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to co-operate with the President in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the conduct of the war with the Imperial Government of Germany; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CURRIE of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 5920) granting a pension to Mary Edna Pierce; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5921) granting a pension to Martin Guthrie; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GANDY: A bill (H. R. 5922) granting an increase of pension to George S. Emery; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5923) granting an increase of pension to George C. Hornby; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. KEATING: A bill (H. R. 5924) granting an increase of pension to William H. Sweeney, jr.; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KEHOE: A bill (H. R. 5925) for the relief of H. W. Reddick; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MCKINLEY: A bill (H. R. 5926) granting an increase of pension to Thomas C. Hadley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OSBORNE: A bill (H. R. 5927) granting a pension to Eugene F. Boyer; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REAVIS: A bill (H. R. 5928) for the relief of Chester D. Barnes; to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. STRONG: A bill (H. R. 5929) granting a pension to Bessie Kerr; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON: A bill (H. R. 5930) granting an increase of pension to William Stoker; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WELTY: A bill (H. R. 5931) granting a pension to Harry Fisher; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5932) granting an increase of pension to William Briney; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, September 5, 1917.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 15, 1917.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

PETITIONS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Local Union No. 64, National Federation of Post Office Clerks, of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the substitution at the same salary in the employ of the Post Office Department of any one dependent of a drafted man to take the place of the drafted man, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Christadelphian Ecclesia of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the exemption of its members from war service along military lines, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FOREIGN DECORATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 2796) to permit American citizens to wear medals or decorations received from certain foreign countries on entering the military or naval service of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 114) thereon.

The President pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. STONE:

A bill (S. 2840) granting a pension to William D. Woodworth; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KNOX:

A bill (S. 2841) granting a pension to George White (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 2842) granting a pension to Charles W. Wormell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WAR REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I rose to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. Having been recognized, I yield to the Senator from Utah to make the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, holding my place through the courtesy of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	Lewis	Penrose
Brady	Hollis	Lodge	Polindexter
Calder	Husting	McCumber	Pomerene
Chamberlain	James	McKellar	Ransdell

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is unavoidably absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], detained by illness. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] because of illness in his family. He is paired for the day with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] under an arrangement which has been made between myself and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I desire this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

Mr. JAMES. I wish to announce that my colleague, the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], is detained by illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for just a second?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to correct a statement that I made yesterday in reply to a question asked me by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. On page 6567 of the RECORD, after yielding to the Senator from California, the RECORD shows:

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Are not those the computations which the Senator gave us a couple of weeks ago?

Mr. SMOOT. They are.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Were not those computations made upon a different basis?

Mr. SMOOT. They were not made upon any different basis.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Is there not a different basis to-day for the Senator's computation?

Mr. SMOOT. That will make no difference at all with the general imposition of a tax under the bracket system.

I want to say that there is a different basis of exemption as the Senator suggested, and that basis, of course, is a minimum of 6 per cent and a maximum of 10 per cent, and it happens in the case of the United States Steel Corporation. It affects that corporation because the rate of interest in the prewar period on $63,000,000 was a little less than 4 per cent on their capital stock. Therefore, there was that difference, and the statement I made yesterday in relation to the United States Steel Corporation as far as the basis of exemption is concerned was not the fact.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has made a request that he wishes me to yield to him, and I gladly do so.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, unless some one else offers a higher-graduated tax on corporations I shall offer an amendment increasing the schedule recommended by the committee 10 per cent, beginning with 22 per cent and going to 70 per cent. If anyone desires to offer a higher one first I will withhold this motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me understand the Senator. The Senator said something about beginning with 22 per cent. I ask the Senator does he mean that he will add 10 per cent to each rate?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Or 10 per cent on the amount of the rate?

Mr. HOLLIS. I will add 10 per cent to each rate, beginning with 22 per cent and ending with 70 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. It begins at 12 and the Senator proposes to begin with 22; and it ends at 60 and the Senator proposes to end at 70.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply wanted to fix in my mind what the Senator proposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Washington for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee if he will not have the expert of the committee ascertain what, for instance, the United States Steel Co. will pay under the proposed amendment of the committee as it now stands.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I will have him do that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would be very glad if the Senator would.

Mr. SIMMONS. Upon the basis of a profit of $490,000,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Upon the basis of a profit of $490,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was stated by myself as the profit. I was not certain whether I was correct as to the amount, but I will find out exactly what the Wall Street Journal says it will be.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have computed also what it would be under the amendment as originally reported by the committee showing the difference between the two propositions.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will send for the expert and let the Senator from Washington ask him to make the computation he desires. I wish to state now for the expert that he is working as hard as he can. He is one of the most industrious men I have ever known in my life, but having scores of Senators who are constantly calling upon him to make calculations he can not comply with everybody's request.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. Does he yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask the Senator whether he would not have the expert calculate the additional revenue that would come in by changing 45 per cent to 50 per cent, and changing 50 per cent to 60 per cent and changing 60 per cent to 70 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the expert to make the calculation if he has time to do it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand the amendment is to the plan as recommended by the Finance Committee and simply increases the amount of 10 per cent on each bracket.

Mr. HOLLIS. My amendment will be to the latest committee recommendation adopting a graduated tax plan on the incomes of corporations.

Mr. THOMPSON. About how much more money will be secured by the Senator's amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. Roughly speaking, it will increase the average percentage of 10 per cent to a total of $4,000,000,000, and it will raise about $400,000,000 more in revenue.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have felt that I desired to submit some views this morning, not that the Senate needed them for its guidance, but which express some reasons I have for not being able to agree in spirit with either contentions presented before the Senate; that is, I am not able to accept altogether the full contentions and the reasons advanced either of the committee or of those proposing the amendments to the feature now under consideration referred to as excess-profits tax and at other times referred to merely as profits tax.

Mr. President, I have had occasion to refer in this body to the peculiar complex constituency I have the honor with my colleague to represent. In a matter of business such as this legislation, I represent, together with my colleague, two states—one the State of Illinois and the other the city of Chicago—and I never knew any one state of conditions which fitted the one that was not at variance with the other, or what the other felt was its necessary state.

This present tax question is not an exception. The viewpoint of the large business interests of my city does not run in harmony with many suggestions which come to me from the smaller localities of the agricultural parts of Illinois. Yet in the larger fields of Illinois, large agricultural institutions seem to be in harmony with the viewpoint of the large business interests of the city in so far as I can gather from telegrams and letters which come in like the swirling autumn leaves under the wind upon us all upon every occasion where anything is a subject of contest in this body. I have felt that for myself I could be content that I should express my differences with the eminent Senators, and give my reasons for them here. I trust I may not occupy the Senate at unnecessary length. It is given to me to close this discussion, as this is the last speech on this phase.

Mr. President, most of us have had occasion to examine into the general treaties on taxation that are printed; also speeches on taxation that have come from the parliamentary discussions of the world, and I think it is only fair to say that probably no discussion was ever ornamented with more elucidation and more learning than that which the Senators have displayed on this bill, and this without regard to the positions for or against that they occupy. This country can congratulate itself upon this spectacle, which no man can justly dispute, that an amount of erudition and learning indicative of industry and sincerity has been shown by their representatives in this body certainly equal to that that is disclosed in the recorded debates and discussions of other parliamentary bodies of the world.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMITH], leading in matters of statistical sustenance of this bill on one side, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the chairman of the committee, on this side leading in the matter of policy, without regard to whether any Senator agrees with them or not, have shown an industry that has been prodigious. The Senators who have led the contest in behalf of these amendments opposing the majority have likewise exposed to the Senate a sincerity and a soul zeal coupled with infinite ability, that can assure the people of this country that no question has passed without most serious investigation. All can say, "Of these—my stewards—only blessing; for that they have been unto me, as to their Lord, faithful gleaners."

But, Mr. President, this is a tax question. When did ever a tax question receive the unanimity of any number of men? The very payment of taxes has irritated, the very suggestion of it has aroused hostility. I see scholars all around me. The very word "taxation," you remember, the Latins took from "taxare," to appraise, and the French went further and took theirs from the old word "tangere," to touch; and it is the "touch" that everybody opposes in the matter of taxation.

And to my own party, speaking now in the presence or in the hearing of our honorable opponents, I must commend you for serious consideration to the observation that Shakespeare puts in the mouth of one of his heroes in As You Like It, which concludes:

And yet you will be whipped for taxation one of these days.

For myself, Mr. President, I never was able to reconcile myself to adopt any view wholly coming from any other source. Possibly these sources are right and I am wrong. I think I have had prejudices against the whole system of taxation. I recall that Dryden, in his essay on Satire, quotes Casaubon as saying of Horace:

He is the son of a taxgatherer. Consequently he smells of his invidious and objectionable occupation.

In an early part of my life I was thrown through the necessities of a young lawyer's struggle to every form of occupation. It fell to me very early to be assistant to a county attorney. I noted then that every farmer contested any tax to open a road. From that time, through all the mutations of my life, however limited its zone, I have confronted those oppositions until I think I am imbued with something of a spirit that questions all form of taxation as to whether it be just.

Mr. President, I have heard eminent Senators on this floor discussing Government tax systems of the past. I heard the eminent Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] spend a great deal of time, that he showed by industry had been applied to the investigation of the tax system of other governments, particularly as to England.

Mr. President, here I pause to invite the attention of the Senate to how little can this past have application here. I illustrate: There was the income tax. France began it, and England did not adopt it until 1789 to meet the demands of the war with Napoleon; but, strange to say, in 1815, so anxious was England that her people should understand that she never could approve a tax that was so inquisitorial, that she had a resolution passed in Parliament wiping out all records and destroying all documents relating to the question of the income tax. It was not until Robert Peel came into power in 1842 that he revised the former practice in order to make up the deficiency occasioned by what was called his free-trade policy. Then, Mr. President, England began a course of varying forms of taxes to meet the expenses of her wars. When I heard the Senator from Wisconsin read an extract from Baron Reading, now Lord Chief Justice of England, in which he called attention to the fact that England was levying taxes as she went along and maintained her wars by taxes. I could not help but wonder how a scholar such as Baron Reading must be so apart from history. He had been himself a broker; he was a lawyer after being a successful broker, and he could not have been ignorant of the whole theory of bonds; and yet it is famous to-day that, far from England's financing her wars by taxation, she did it by bonds and to such an extent that many of her bonds to carry on the War of the Revolution in the United States of America are still outstanding and unpaid.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin, if he desires.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Only to correct the impression that my distinguished friend seems to have derived from the newspaper interview with Chief Justice Reading, from which I quoted. Chief Justice Reading was not commending the course that England had pursued in this war, nor did he refer to any other, but was criticizing it for the reason that England had issued so large a percentage of bonds in proportion to the percentage of taxation with which she was meeting her war expenses.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I had had occasion to read that interview before the eminent Senator from Wisconsin read it. I had occasion to read it in the New York Evening Mail, and I was struck with the observations of Baron Reading when he sought to make a comparison between France, which he said was opposed to the theory concerning which he was speaking, and Germany. The able Senator from Wisconsin may be right, that Baron Reading's remarks were addressed solely as a protest; but I had derived a different view.

Nevertheless, I call attention that England, from 1853 to 1900, adopted always the complex system of part taxes and part bonds. She put the Boer War wholly on loans. However, let us not forget, Senators, that during these wars of England she was able to requite the losses to those who paid large taxes by turning over to them the results of her conquests in different parts of the country, and her territorial acquisitions, through which they created commercial companies after the order of the East India Co. of India and the South African Co. of Africa; so the tax laid upon them fell most largely by the system upon her large commercial enterprises, which were immediately requited by these forms of Government favors, which this Government under no condition could engage in. So, Mr. President, far from taxation alone supporting England or being able to support her, she levied the form of taxation in lieu of bonds only when she granted land and large concessions in return for taxation.

On the other hand, France, under Napoleon and up to 1868, maintained her wars by paying as she went, the policy of Cæsar—who was ever, of course, the patron saint of Napoleon—of seizing and foraging from any point wherever they went. In that manner they paid for their wars by adding a levy of gold upon each community as they advanced toward it.

In the Punic wars, in the wars that Rome made against Greece, in those she made against Carthage, this system had been adopted; but, nevertheless, we have ancient classic history reminding us of the claim of unfairness of how Cæsar would levy as against one district a certain area of corn when they complained he should have put it upon barley.

That, Mr. President, was but a repetition of incidents recorded from the Holy Scriptures, where the complaint was made that the ephahs of barley had been too many, levied by Gideon, that the levy should have been upon the dates and the palm trees, indicative of how little there is new in the protests against taxation; that upon whatever we lay it there are always reasons why it should be laid in some other way.

But I am particularly attracted, sir, by a certain limited class of citizens in my country who, if I recall accurately, spread placards all over this country previous to the election demanding war and the sustaining of national honor; marched in processions by the thousands, yelling, screaming, making the day hideous and the night questionable, clamoring for war. Many of these did not know or understand any principle of Government that was at stake; they did not understand the principle of liberty that now is imperiled; but they had been given to understand that the call for war was popular; it was financially and socially aristocratic—and yet, sir, I am now particularly attracted by how many of the gentlemen who led those undertakings are now leading in the protest against any form of taxation whatever to pay for that war. These things impress me as I view them, and I can not say that the impression is at all kindly. I behold that limited class of gentlemen as disclosing to our country an exhibition of the absence of patriotism and a display of selfishness that will taint their generation, if it shall be remembered by those who shall come in after days.

But, Mr. President, the question with us, therefore, is not shall we follow the English system, which we have seen can vary in all forms, and if it be continued in further taxation would be the destruction of England, for the Senator from Wisconsin accurately called attention to the condition of England—that she is already in such a state by the process of her fiscal policy that there is a question in the minds of many men whether her bonds could be regarded the equal of the bonds of other countries engaged in this war, and whether they can be wholly esteemed at this time a perfectly safe investment. Surely we do not wish to emulate entirely the system of a country whose conditions of revenue as the result of the system adopted, or that which is proposed, could have brought her down to a verge where eminent men in all countries freely confess that there is a serious question about the flotation or the immediate capitalization of the securities issued for that war.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator will pardon me, anything that may be said with regard to England's financial condition would certainly not be chargeable to the methods which she has employed in financing the war, but to the enormous burdens which the war has put upon her. As rich as this country is, if the Senator will permit me to say so, if we continue in this war as long in proportion to our great wealth and resources as England has continued in it, we will be brought to the same deplorable financial state that England finds herself in to-day, though not as a result of the system of apportioning her war debt as between bonds and taxation, because perhaps she has done as well as she could, and she may have taxed pretty well up to the limit. However, it is the overwhelming testimony upon all sides that, so far as the business is concerned, whatever may be said of the Government finances and the resources of the country as a whole, the business of England was never in so prosperous a condition as it is now.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I can not accept the suggestion of the eminent Senator that if we continue in war the same length of time as England has continued in it we would be in the same condition, because I fear that overlooks the fact that we are a larger country and have greater resources.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he is not quoting me correctly. I said the same length of time in proportion to our wealth and resources.

Mr. LEWIS. Perchance the qualification may correct the apprehension I had. But, Mr. President, I am merely inviting attention to the fact that none of these countries could we wholly emulate or copy or pattern from. We can not in our present condition fit ourselves either to Germany or to France or to England. What this country must pause to consider is that we must meet the conditions as they have arisen in America; and, sir, I make bold to assert that this is the time we should prescribe an American system to meet our own needs, a system which, while it meets the wants of to-day, will not deprive us of the needs of to-morrow.

Mr. President, I have listened to the discussion upon these amendments, and I can not say that I have not great sympathy with many of the positions taken by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and with much of the reasoning of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]; but I have watched the controversy, and unless I do violence to the situation these eminent leaders have impressed me that in their zeal and their soul sincerity this contest has been led away from the mere abstract question of what is the best method of taxation to where there is an agreeable rivalry as to who shall be the king of the radicals in this discussion—the fiery Rlenzi of the Pacific, the distinguished Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], or the avenging Gracchus of the West, the courageous Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. They have well sustained their views with impressive arguments, reinforced, as I have seen, by my friend the Mirabeau of the mountains, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. I have too much respect for the intelligence of these gentlemen not to realize that they present these questions because they have investigated them and because they have the sincerity of their convictions; but, Mr. President, I do not feel that this is an hour when we can wholly address ourselves to the mere gratification of a theory which under ordinary circumstances would be acceptable, but which under the present ones would, in my opinion, be most inappropriate. This can not be a contest for triumph of conservatism or of radicalism. It must be an effort of rationalism, for justice to man, rights to property, and preservation of country, and, sir, these by any system that can properly be applied. It can not matter what title we apply to it. I may be wrong; these other Senators may be right; but the question is, What is our situation?

Mr. President, we have been in this war practically six months. It is the first war of its kind ever undertaken by this country. It is an experiment; it is an experiment as to methods by which it is to be conducted; it is an experiment as to the results which will come from it; and it is peculiarly an experiment as to the methods that we shall devise for carrying it on.

I am strongly impressed with the feeling that if we were to adopt a plan that would in any way frighten the new undertakings we would put upon this country a paralysis of industry that would so chill the ardor of our countrymen that they would impute that result to the war and not to the methods of taxation for the war, and thus, far from inviting enthusiasm and support to the war, would deaden the sensation and cause our countrymen to feel that our entering into the war meant the bankruptcy of their business, the slaying of their prosperity, the shutting off of opportunity, and then there would arise in America revolt against the enterprise. It might not express itself in any form of open insurrection, yet in the hearts of mothers it would be breathed; upon the lips of business men it would be whispered; by every action of men of finance we would feel its influence. The result would be, sir, that our country would, I fear, fall into paralysis.

Senators, I do not refer to the munition makers; I have not much interest in them other than that so long as they are in an honorable occupation they shall be protected by this Government. I refer to that other thought which the advocates of the high-tariff policy, those gentlemen who represent a school which it seems to me is rapidly being vindicated by the events in certain portions of the world, have upheld. They have ever presented the thought that new enterprises must take the place of old and that new undertakings must be begun, and that those engaged in them must receive some form of encouragement.

Mr. President, I am of the opinion that if the United States should undertake to plant here in our country industries and manufactories in the undertakings of science, of mechanism, of chemistry, and along other lines that I need not detail at length, to take the place of similar enterprises which for years have served us from Europe, they, sir, could not long be encouraged if a form of taxation was inaugurated having for its object munition makers only, but which in its operation extended itself to every one of these new and necessary undertakings.

These new enterprises, which now we must begin anew, which heretofore we never have undertaken, to take the place of those that are burned away in Europe from which heretofore we have obtained the supplies and instrumentalities, could never continue if a policy of taxation were adopted here which, while merely being addressed to munitions establishments or war profits from "war material," yet in its operations made it impossible for any other enterprise to continue.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] invited our attention to a thought that previously had not engaged me. It was that in the West, in the new States where enterprises of mining and the cognate undertakings that flow from mining are being now undertaken, the system of taxation proposed, however appropriate it might seem to those who wish to levy a heavy burden upon munitions makers in Pennsylvania, would, nevertheless, in its application lay its effect and result upon the small undertakings in those mining States and they would be wiped out and new enterprises which have been given a new life would die and all their hopes of to-morrow be blasted.

Now, sir, in the State of Illinois, for which I speak, in many of the small cities of my State there are those who have undertaken new manufactures, new enterprises, and I can understand from the representations they make to me, particularly in agricultural sections, where they have begun now to turn all forms of grain into all forms of result that heretofore have obtained only in Germany, that if we adopted a system of taxation that bore heavily upon them the result would be to close up their small cities, to shut off these undertakings, and to leave them, Mr. President, where they would have to rely upon nothing but the farms. I can see the force of that argument, and while I recognize that in protecting these and giving them exemption we may to some extent grant incidentally a favor in the result of the system to some institutions which we feel are obtaining too much, we can not go to the extreme of destroying those who should be protected and properly guarded because of some one that we feel is bloated in the largeness of its prosperity.

However, Mr. President, I have another question to submit to Senators who have assembled to do me the courtesy to hear me. What do you think, Senators, is our present situation as to the duration of this war? Let us look at the situation as we have it in history.

This war will either continue for two years, or it will end in two months. To my vision, I see the prospect of peace. My judgment is that the Prussian military dynasty will avail itself as quickly as it can of the offer contained in the communication of the President of the United States to his holiness, the Pope of Rome. Mr. President, my judgment is that Germany can not fail to view how the cordon of all the aspiring nations of the world, practically, is tightening around her, and how, soon or late, she will be compelled to yield; and, sir, that when she yields under such pressure, she will then have terms dictated to her which she will be forced to take from the avenging allies. I hold, as I see it, that Prussia would prefer to take any terms presented by the United States than be forced to take all the terms that may be presented shortly by her enemies, the European rivals; and why?

The President of the United States made it clear that this Government was not in this war for territorial acquisition, nor for trade reprisals, nor for commercial conquests, nor for blood money. He made it clear that the charge that is being made in different parts of the United States, for the purpose of inciting revolt against enlistment and awakening unpopularity against the war, that we were in this fight to fight Britain's battles, to fight the battles of European lands whose issue was conquest of territory—the President, speaking for this, our country, specifically refutes that charge. Sir, no man of justice in any part of this country can again make that accusation without making it with the deliberate purpose that all mankind must see is to mislead his countrymen.

Therefore, since these European opponents must realize among themselves the exact limit to which the United States will go in this conflict, they must realize, and Germany, as I see it, does realize, that she can throw herself upon the mercy of the United States; that she can tender herself to the Republic of this Government and allow this Government to be the arbiter of the peace terms, conscious, as she must be, that the spirit of our institutions and the motive which took us into this war make it impossible that she need fear that we would enter into the dismembering of her central empire or shut her off from the marts of trade of the world or deny her the free chance of a free man for freedom in a free world. With us she knows ever lives the maxim of our policy, "Justice for all, persecution to none."

Therefore, sir, I am impelled to the thought that in a short while Germany will find her way to accept the proposition of the President of the United States, that she will not decline it, because this is her moment. And, Mr. President, there is in my mind this thought: That Germany will see that if it be not now, her future must be one that the President has laid down to her choice—a fight to the finish and to the death of the imperial power of Germany or, sir, the surrender of mere official authority at Berlin and the acceptance of a governmental authority suggested by her people in some mode agreeable to the mass of the voters, and through that, Mr. President, deal with the United States and in that manner comply with the very clear suggestion of our Government, disclosing how impossible it is to deal directly with the Hohenzollerns.

Senators, there flashes to my mind a matter that will interest us upon reviving it to our minds. When France had war with Germany in 1871-72, and the time came for peace, am I not right when I say that Germany declined to deal with the Emperor Napoleon III, giving as her reason, through Von Moltke, that the French Emperor was a deceiver and a usurper, if I recall the free translation, and could not be relied upon, for he had deceived them in a dispatch, which is now famous in history? Germany refused to treat with the French Emperor, and then it was, recognizing that fact, that the French people called a convention, which we speak of as a congress, and there proposed the resolution, satisfactory to Germany, which was then made the basis of the terms of peace, and it was with that that Germany dealt and closed terms that closed the Franco-German war.

It is my judgment, Mr. President, that Germany will repeat her own precedent, and, through her people, will bring about some form of convention or congress as a result of her own plebiscite, and tender through these suggestions as to the acceptance of the policy enunciated by the President, conscious that if it is not done the sure fate awaits her—that is clearly inevitable to the understanding and to the view of all mankind.

Then, Mr. President, are we not remitted to this question, I ask the Senator: Of what amount of money do we need now? How much do we feel it is essential to raise at this particular time, in view of these surroundings which suggest to us the possibility of an early end of the war?

Our troops are moving out. Ammunition must be had; munitions of war must be provided, and everything that goes to the necessity of war; and yet, Mr. President, would we not be most unwise if we failed to recognize that we might levy upon our people at this time a burden which would be so much heavier than the necessities require as to bring upon them a spirit almost of insurrection against us, and one of such bitterness that we had laid such a burden upon them that they would look upon us as having made war on America instead of war upon Germany?

It is because I am moved by that consideration that I am compelled to ask the Senators, Must we not provide for the demands of these enterprises that are all about us, apart from these that are engaged in the manufacture of munitions? Must we not take some step that shall encourage them? Must we keep general prosperity from the poor farmer who sells his bale of hay, the man who sells his stock—cattle, hogs, and horses—the man who sells his milk, butter, and cheese; the man who sells wheat, corn, and rye; the man who sells chickens and eggs? May not all of these be the victims of any unfair policy of taxation of profits? And then in the cities, the small stores, the small undertakings, the little factories, and the tollers—these, sir, if we levy an unnecessary burden upon them, will be the first to fall and their owners and supporters the first to retaliate on us.

Mr. President, I am not divorced from my obligation to my party because we are dealing here in a nonpartisan way. I will not blind myself to the fact that if we blunder in this proceeding at this time, the honorable gentlemen on the other side, when the time comes for political issues, will have a right to go out to the country and charge the responsibility on us. We can not retort by replying, "Behold their votes!" Their reply would be, "Yes; we supported anything presented by you gentlemen since you were in power, that it might be said we were harmonizing with you and cooperating with you in every way, and that it could not be said we were opposing the administration in war times"; and they will be justified. Why, if they took any other course they would be open in many instances to the charge in their own party that they did not support the administration. If, therefore, we bring to them a policy the support of which means ultimately the destruction of us politically we will have ourselves only to blame.

Mr. President, I will not, so far as I am concerned, blind myself to the fact that it is the mass of humble people to whom we the democracy are to go for vindication and from whom we may hope to receive it, and will recall that it was from these that we have been put in power, and through them that we are now commissioned; and I will not permit a system to be adopted here if I can protest against it with success, that eventually will call into action the retaliation of all those who look to us as friends. Sir, I recognize that all others who never have been our friends or the friends of the spirit of democracy will be found where they have always been found—against us.

Therefore, Mr. President, I want the system prevailing in this country not to duplicate what has transpired in England. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] says business never was so good in England. The able Senator is addressing himself to certain phases of business. I must remind the Senator that he has not read accurately the history of England. Permit me to call it to his attention.

England's policy in this war, caused, let us say, partly by the labor situation, partly by the situation as to what they call death rates, partly by the situation as to the land, drove her enterprises out of England. Mr. President, it was England's money that built Japan. Let us be frank. We are dealing with history. Japan started upon the system in which she is now engaging, by which she is able to make supplies for the allies and supply them to the extent of enrichment to herself; but in the beginning, sir, the policy of England, known as her fiscal policy, drove much of her money from her. The owners found it more profitable to lend it in Japan, from which Japan was enabled to benefit in great wealth because of the fiscal policy she adopted. Shall we duplicate that? If we duplicate it, how will it go?

Senators, if we adopt here a policy that in its operation shall shut out the smaller instrumentalities or enterprises from arising and growing, the result will be clear. You will build South America. South America will borrow from the United States. South America has cheap labor. We will build in South America manufactories; we will create establishments in Central America, Cuba, Porto Rico; and from South America and those neighboring countries, friendly to different of the combatants, will come, sir, the supplies which heretofore have come from us.

Let us view one other situation, sir. The attitude of Canada at the beginning was one of an unusual fiscal policy, and by its effect she built up Australia, and she gave such life and vitality to the enterprises of two of the Australias that promptly she realized her error and has changed her policy in order that she might rejuvenate Canada. Yet, sir, eminent Senators look at these early policies on the part of England on parts of Britain and fail to draw the lesson that we should draw from them. They ask us to duplicate these that have now been lately rejected. I am unable to behold these discarded policies as profitable; I see them as destructive; I can not deliberately pattern after them.

Mr. President, my position, therefore, is this: As I feel that this war can not last long, I accept the position of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] as meritorious in its abstract. I accept the position of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] as meritorious in its abstract. I take the position of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], or that of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], or that of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and I will concede them all to be correct; but I ask the able Senators, merely because the policy is correct, for some time that may yet arise, is it right to enforce it suddenly? Is it wise to apply it at once? Mr. President, is it not wiser, in view of the fact that this war is likely to terminate shortly, in view of the conditions surrounding us, that we levy year by year the taxes necessary to meet our expenses year by year, that we may not paralyze the undertakings throughout our country, nor incite the toilers and the workmen to the fear that they are to be discharged because of the burdens laid upon those who employ them? By this form, sir, of a levy year by year we keep business going, and we reach the result which the eminent Senators would have us attain, but we reach it slowly. We levy each year, Mr. President, the amount of taxes necessary for the following year's needs; and by this policy, sir, as fast as the taxes are laid they are collected. In this form, as I said, we levy these taxes. They are collected each year. Then, as the demands of the war continue, we pay out the taxes back to the people in buying supplies. In this you have an endless chain, as I see it, collecting from year to year and paying back to the people the taxes collected from them, or paying them the returns from the bonds, as the case may be. Money is drawn from one pocket which is restored to the other. There is no such great drain at the beginning as would intimidate and terrorize any undertaking of business or class of people.

Now, Mr. President, the eminent Senator from California uses an illustration which may well calculate to invite the attention of the country when he says we are summoning our men; we are conscripting them; they are not waiting. I answer the learned Senator, and say I fear he does not really measure the effect of that. That is just what we are doing. Instead of levying upon the men for the full sum of all that may be demanded, we are doing now the very thing that I respectfully urge should be done respecting the tax. We are levying first upon a certain sum of men and they go to the front, and then upon another sum of men, and then they go to the front, and then upon another quota of men; and we are taking, sir, by this system of installment policy the men in exactly the same way that I feel the committee has adopted respecting the levying of the tax upon business. The relation is the same. The method is the same, and the physical and the final result will be the same.

Let me propose to you this thought: Suppose to-morrow morning the cry should go forth in this country that immediately 10,000,000, the assumed full amount America contributes—can contribute—shall be at once brought to the front under the colors, what a panic you would strike in the heart of every mother; what misery in the bosom of every father; what paralysis upon every business house, or what deadening stupor upon every city; what pall of blight and gloom upon the Republic. Yet my eminent friend by presenting his figure of speech, anxious, I dare say, that it could be considered unanswerable in its illustration and that it might appeal to the sentiment of the land, yet unhappily failed to calculate that the method of calling out our men was the exact parallel of that which is being done by the committee in the method of calling out the money from the pockets. We are levying a tribute upon the lives and money in the exact system one with the other.

Now, Mr. President, if the war continues we issue bonds, and Senators have said that issuing these bonds creates a double liability. I have heard Senators read articles upon the floor, the most copious. To my thinking the clearest article upon the distinction of issuing bonds and levying taxes is by the vice president of the Chamber of Deputies of Italy. It will be found, if Senators are interested in it, in the last Review of Reviews. That is, the translation will there be found. This distinguished foreign statesman brings attention to the matter to which I wish to invite the attention of the Senate as applicable to our own country.

The eminent Senator from New Hampshire, whose zeal we all admire and whose industry and sincerity in behalf of the common plain people of this country have been signally observed on the floor ever since he has given his service to this body, in his inquiry the other day called the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin that as to bonds, the bonds we issue upon one rate while the war is on, and that when peace comes prices may fall and the bonds are paid at such a rate. That is ordinarily true, sir. Mr. President, such has been the experience of countries such as England, but, sir, pardon me for inviting Senators to a distinction which should not be overlooked. When we had other wars we have been compelled to import from other countries steel and iron and munitions. Our condition in this country is such that we are supplying ourselves and also all the others, and the money that we draw from our own people we are spending in our own home. We are returning every dollar we get to our own people. It is not as it has been in the days past when such things were by us purchased from abroad and we sent out our money to pay, or sent it, if you please, in exchanges to pay. The conditions are so different that we now levy the tax or collect for the bonds and turn the money back to the people in the purchasing of all that goes to running the Government, giving employment to every line of art, every species of undertaking, every avenue of toil, every form of business, every kind of adventure, and in that way far from being the loser we keep constantly in circulation in our own country all that we collect from our people.

In the meantime let there be that other thought, that we still leave avenues here open where there are opportunities of taxation for the cities upon that same business, for the county upon that same business, for the State upon that same business, by which the city may maintain its municipal institutions, the county its county interests, the State its welfare. Do my eminent friends, the Senators who oppose this committee report, pause to reflect that if the system suggested by them were carried fully into effect to what extent the State would be depleted of the wherewith from which taxes could be gotten to maintain its local institutions? Do they contemplate what will be the effect of the municipality and upon it? Sir, did it occur to them that in France, in Germany, but particularly in England, no such system of taxation prevails in its dual form as is adopted here, and if this Government could levy a tax suddenly and that in its effect should be so great and absorb so much that it would leave these respective States without anything that could respond to the local levy for the maintenance of local institutions, not only, sir, would we have revolt of the individual business man, to whom I have heretofore referred, but the farmer and toiler, because we would stifle their business, and the locality itself, the State, would feel we had impoverished it. It would have to issue local, State, or county bonds. From such consequence we would have an enemy in our own home and in our own home country.

Senators speak of the Civil War, that certain taxing produced ill results and certain bonding produced ill results, and then they call attention to the futility of the policy then of issuing bonds. Senators, do not my eminent friend from Wisconsin and the distinguished Senator from California recognize that at the time to which they allude the United States had but half a country. It was levying its revenue on but half the country, on a divided land, a house divided against itself?

Of course, there were two things to contend against. One was divided resources, the other was divided spirit. There can be no parallel of then to now. Senators need not fear any deduction that could be drawn from those experiences. To-day ours is a united country. We draw from every State and from all citizens, and we return the tax to all.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask, what can become of the money that is to be in this country? It is with us if it is left with the people. It can do no injury to owner or country. If attempted to be taken to Europe, the European countries would promptly commandeer it and appropriate it. No citizen of America will try to take his money out of the United States. It will be still with us in all forms of taxation and all forms of uses.

Now, if the war shall end, as the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from California say, without the money be levied on as war taxes we will lose the money we would have gotten. I answer them they are in error. They are grievously in error and an error that fails to comprehend the real situation. If war shall end promptly, then to rehabilitate the land all this available money will be seized by the Government in the same process of alternate taxation and the installment system, first by an income tax constantly increased. I alluded to that here on the floor the other day in my advocacy of the increase of the income tax. This income tax will be levied upon the citizen. He will pay it.

The eminent Senator from New Hampshire, for whose legal ability I have great respect, remarked that the corporation could have no income tax. I say perchance in its legal relation it does not, but it should have. If it is called upon to pay a county tax, if it is called on as a corporation to pay a State tax there is no sense why it should not pay an income tax if the income is levied for the purposes of the war in order to maintain the institutions out of which that corporation reaps its benefits and its profits. After the war this income tax will be laid. It will be laid to rehabilitate our country. It will be laid, among other things, to pay off our obligations. We will increase the income taxes just as rapidly as the necessities of our country require.

In addition to that will be the national inheritance tax. Those who will pass away and seek to transmit wealth in its great volume will be met with the strong hand of an inheritance form of tax that this country can well increase, because those who inherit from the dead have no natural inherent right to the property. They have but a privilege to enjoy it only by virtue of the consent of the Government in laws passed by Government ordaining such. The Government therefore shall have the right to say to them the proportion that it will be equitable to pay for expenses of the Government and what shall be laid upon it even if it is heavy. Therefore the fear expressed by the Senator from California and the Senator from Wisconsin that at the close of the war this property would not be accessible to taxation is, as I see it, wholly without such foundation to give us the fear they summon up.

Mr. President, it is because of that that I have become the advocate here of that increase of the income tax, whether now or hereafter, as a proper move in order that we might reach riches by installments and not as Senators insist by that other system that reaches out with one sudden grasp and takes all, root and branches, leaf and flower.

Mr. President, I have pointed out my reasons why I sustain the method of the committee. Now, sir, may I for a moment anticipate a contrary course? Suppose we take the other course suggested by zealous, earnest Senators and levy a tax to the extent that Senators say, and we put the burden upon these institutions in the manner that it is claimed. Mr. President, let us be just when we reckon with human nature.

Mr. President, I am about to make an observation most disagreeable to me to make, disagreeable because it applies a truth that is regrettable. I heard the eminent Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who I have termed the Mirabeau of the mountains, in his excellent discussion yesterday doubt whether the limit of the patriotism on the part of certain large institutions was the amount of cash which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] intimated he thought was only available from them as voluntary contribution.

Mr. President, I state, what I regret, that this now published in certain financial publications, that if we laid a form of taxation, such as distinguished citizens and Senators insist upon, men engaged in enterprises throughout the country, beyond justice to themselves as they see it, these men would cease their undertakings because the margin left to those gentlemen would not be sufficient to justify them in continuing the works or enterprises. They would cease and they would take their money out of manufacturing and lend it where it could bring them interest at this time, just as England did when she was driven to make her loans to Japan, from which Japan moved to her great industries by which she survives now in such riches. We will concede that these men referred to are patriotic, but we are brought here against one of two propositions. It is that these undertakings must be given some opportunity or, by the result I refer to, we must wipe them out of existence by the taxation we would lay, according to the plan of certain Senators. If we do this, we must be prepared to convert the Government at once into a munition factory, then into a business house, and then a manufacturing establishment, and turn it into a general agency of business in order to get supplies for the Government. We must not be foolish and indulge in dreams that any fellow citizen who has his millions will put them into an undertaking to supply the Government at expense to himself, all because we levy it upon him, as we have the power to do, in the name of patriotism and government. That, sir, we must reckon with. Sir, I now prophesy that there will very soon come a time in this Government when the Government will have to take possession of all the public utilities and the public agencies necessary to the just government and welfare of the citizen. The question will then be upon us whether we operate them ourselves or by agencies to which we may lease them. But rapidly, sir, we are coming to the point where this Government, in order to properly protect itself against the monopolistic tendencies in certain areas in this land that have been so exorbitant, shall stop their instrumentality and by the power of eminent domain or through operation of the Government take them over promptly and put them into operation.

We, sir, who are in this body, if we shall be allowed to live the divine stage of life, will see after the war has ceased that this Government will enter straight through into the business of transportation, of munition and ammunitions, of shipbuilding, and of every enterprise that is necessary for the welfare of government as an organization. But until that time does come we have got to reckon with conditions just as we have them—private ownership and private operation.

Mr. President, I am opposed as much as any man can be to extreme profits enjoyed by that class of men who are in the business of making munitions or making supplies for the Government and wringing unjust profits from the Nation. From such I would take the exorbitant profit that is beyond reason and beyond justice and give it to the Government for governmental uses. But, Mr. President, because some of these makers do this wrongful extortion does not justify my mind that we should take everything from all others through the power of confiscation called taxes as a punishment for one wrongful and wronging institution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the exorbitant flat rates that were proposed to be imposed without regard to the amount of profit that a business made would absolutely prevent new enterprises from undertaking anything. Not only, as the Senator suggests, would it have a tendency to make some fail, but it would prevent absolutely people from undertaking enterprises when they have got to pay to the Government 80 per cent of profits or 60 per cent of their profits or 50 per cent of their profits. It seems to me that we are bound to have a condition of development if we are going to have a long war.

Mr. LEWIS. The interruption of the Senator is not only pertinent but, of course, contributes a great deal. The Senator has been an eminent executive of one of the great productive States of the Union and has had occasion to observe enterprises rise and fall, and he can speak from that experience. I readily accept and appreciate his suggestion as being accurate, as I behold it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In the interest of accuracy I think the Senator from Colorado ought not to state that the proposition of the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from California contemplated taking a flat rate of all the profits.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There are certain exemptions of course. Everybody understands that.

Mr. KING. It is contemplated that the prewar profits should be retained except by the imposition of a small tax, a normal tax, but they did propose the imposition of a flat rate upon profits which are the result of the war which postulate the interposition into the business arena of individual forces that are entirely extraneous to individual effort. It seems to me, if the Senator will pardon me, that no one can object to a proposition that says to a man, "We leave to you all the profits that you have made before the war. We do not touch your property. We give you all the profits you have made before except the small tax which is imposed, and we lay our hands upon those profits that are the result of the war, and ask that you in this crisis shall make a large contribution from those profits toward the maintenance of the war."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to say that I have no doubt that there are many instances in which high rates ought to be imposed—there is not any question about that—and I think this bill would be improved if the 45 per cent rate were made 50 per cent, if the 50 per cent rate were made 60 per cent, and if the 60 per cent rate were made 70 per cent. I believe thereby probably the tax would reach those people who have been making money directly out of munitions and business of that kind; but, Mr. President, when the Government attempts to apply to persons who are making but a small profit an enormous exaction it thereby deters them from going into new enterprises. Under such circumstances they will not open up new fields of activity.

There may be the question as to whether the profits made have been made as a result of the war. Suppose a new enterprise is started now, from what date is the reckoning to be made? All of the profits will have to be taxed unless some form of exemption is devised. Such a policy as that proposed will deter people from going into new enterprises, and it is absolutely necessary that we shall have new enterprises in order that the business of the country may be kept in successful operation, for this war may be a long one.

It seems to me, Mr. President, for that reason that a graduated tax would be much better than a flat tax, because it will reach people who are able to pay a high rate, but it will touch new enterprises lightly and will enable such enterprises to be undertaken. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has just made a statement the effect of which he does not appreciate. In the main I agree with what the Senator has said; but when he states that a rate of 70 per cent could be imposed and active productivity in this country still be maintained, I contend that would be out of the question.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask my colleague to wait until I finish this statement.

Mr. KING. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. The proposition of the Senator from Colorado is out of the question, because after the imposition of the tax of 70 per cent, on the 30 per cent which would be left, immediately after it is declared as a dividend, an income tax would be levied, and there would be nothing left. The company, therefore, could not make any improvements and extensions.

Take, for instance, the Bethlehem Steel Co., which has been referred to here so often. Their average prewar earnings were $6,651,488; their earnings for 1916 were $57,944,754, or a difference of $53,715,041. Mr. President, if 70 per cent of that amount had been taken as a war tax it would have been impossible for the Bethlehem Steel Co. to have made the improvements which it has made, for the reason that the Bethlehem Steel Co. has not only used those profits, but it has borrowed all it could possibly borrow, to erect additional plants, to place machinery in those plants, and to extend its credit. If the proposition which is now presented here had been in force last year it would have bankrupted that company, and if it is put in force this year, without a question of doubt it will have the same effect.

I speak only of that company, but what would be the effect of the proposition on other companies of small capital, which on account of the business conditions brought about by the war have extended their business and have borrowed every dollar of money possible for its extension? Mr. President, anyone who will give the matter any attention must admit that if the profits for 1917 are now to be taken away, such companies can not repay the money which they have borrowed; and when the war ceases all of the improvements which they have made, as I have said many times, will not be worth what they paid for them; they will not be worth 50 per cent of what they paid for them; and in many cases—and particularly in cases of plant and machinery, and items of that sort—they will not be worth more than 10 cents on the dollar.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit me merely to make a single observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The argument which has just been presented by the Senator from Utah is the argument which was presented, as shown by Mr. Lloyd-George's speech and by Mr. Bonar Law's speech, by the business men of England over and over again in 1915 and 1916. That has been answered, Mr. President, by the result. Those business institutions did not go bankrupt, but, on the other hand, they have prospered immensely, notwithstanding the heavy tax that has been levied during those three years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Illinois will excuse me—and I beg the Senator's pardon—

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. The tax that is proposed to be imposed under the substitute amendment as reported to the Senate, calculated upon the exemptions that are allowed by England and those which are to be allowed in this country, is a greater percentage than that which is imposed in England.

Mr. BORAH. I do not dispute that at all; I am simply saying, irrespective of the change that has been made in the bill and the fact stated by the Senator from Utah, that the argument which the Senator is making is the argument which was made by the business men of England at the time these taxes were laid on; but, notwithstanding that fact, they have prospered. They put something into the business that they had not anticipated they would, and that was an extraordinary exertion and manifestation of patriotism, which took the place, to some extent, of what theretofore had been profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho now that if there is a business institution in England that has put all of its war profits into improvements and enlargement of its plant, and has not provided against the close of the war, it is going to be bankrupt when the war ceases.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no power of prophecy, and I shall not enter that field.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not require any power of prophecy, Mr. President, to see that. That is too great a question for me to discuss in the time of the Senator from Illinois, but I want to emphasize my statement, Mr. President, because it can not successfully be denied.

Not only that, but we are imposing by the committee's substitute a greater per cent, upon the same basis, upon excess profits and war profits than is being imposed in England to-day; and, over and above that, we are imposing the highest income-tax rates of any country in all the world.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understood the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] to say that many large corporations had been forced to borrow a great deal of money to put into their business. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; their monthly reports show it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The question I want to ask is, If they have borrowed that money and added it to their capital, and they have the capital, are they not entitled under the bill to an exemption on all of the increased capital which they have put in?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, borrowed money is not capital, and it is not allowed as an exemption under the definition of capital in the committee substitute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But they may use it and put it in as capital.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they can use it, but they have got to pay every dollar of it to the banks from which they borrow it, and as soon as the war is over, if not before, the banks will see that they do pay it. If they had the money and they put it into capital, or if they sold the bank capital stock, then the bank could not demand the money back; but that is not what they are doing. They are borrowing the money and they have got to pay every dollar of it back.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, unless some other Senator desires to contribute to my speech that which he assumes would be a great improvement, I will proceed. [Laughter.]

I have, sir, referred to the distinctions that I felt had been lost sight of between the situation which prevails where money raised by bonds is spent in the country where the bonds are issued and sold and the situation which prevails as to money raised by bonds where the money is spent in countries other than where the bonds are issued.

The eminent Senator from California, whose investigation of this subject is a credit to the Senate and whose presentation was an honor to his seat, called attention, as did the Senator from Wisconsin, to what he felt were the difficulties forced upon the country by bond issues and by money raised by bonds and the evils flowing from that course. The senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] interpolated at that time an observation seeking to demonstrate that our present bond situation was not a liability, but had produced a form of asset for business uses; for that we had the bonds of solvent European countries as security for the bonds we issue in our name. I heard the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] read from a couple of essays or contributions of professors of economics to sustain his view expressed. Now I should like to read a paragraph from the article to which I have alluded.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I dislike to interrupt the Senator—

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator need have no hesitancy in interrupting me.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But the remarks that were made by the Senator from California have evidently been confounded by the Senator from Illinois with remarks made by some other Senator. I had nothing to say about any bond issues, and I take it the Senator has confounded the remarks of some other Senator with the remarks that were made by me in that regard.

Mr. LEWIS. That may be, but I thought I understood the Senator to suggest that high taxation should be imposed, because in the absence of it we levied tribute in the form of bonds or got money from other sources which sooner or later worked a great injustice to the people, from the fact that they had to be repaid from their incomes and also from their capital. I may have been wrong in imputing that suggestion to the Senator from California; probably it was the Senator from Wisconsin. At any rate, I have been trying to get to, and I should like to read, a paragraph from the La Nuova Rassegna (New Era) of Rome, contributed by Giulio Alessio, vice president of the Italian Chamber of Deputies. He calls attention to the changes that have been caused by the present war, and says:

The question as to whether war expenses should or could be covered by increased taxation alone has been much debated of late—

I should like to have my friend, the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] listen to this.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The junior Senator from Utah is now in the chair.

Mr. LEWIS. I am honored to have him preside. I could not see him through my glasses—not that I do not wish to see him through every opportunity afforded—

It has been urged that higher taxes are really more equitable and less oppressive than large loans, the theory being that the latter drain the savings of the nation and tend to raise the rate of interest, this in time causing higher prices for commodities. Moreover, the sums expended by the State out of the proceeds of the loans are not evenly distributed among the different classes of citizens, but go to those interested in certain special industries. Therefore, while the larger part of the population suffers from the enhanced prices for necessities, a minority enjoy wages or profits high enough to offset all added expenses.

Within this sphere, however, the conditions are stable enough. If the money for the loans is derived from the savings of those who earn high wages, as well as from the bank credits of industrial enterprises whose profits have been greatly increased, and, as must normally result, the amounts realized by the State are soon expended and find their way back to the favored class of wage earners and industrial enterprises, then the process could go on almost indefinitely.

It is easy enough to insist on the apparent inequity of a financial policy based on loans, but this is the only one capable of attaining a definite and satisfactory result. In the present state of public opinion, however much greater may appear to be the sacrifice made by the combatant at the front, when compared with the highly recompensed aid given by the lender of funds to the National Treasury, it is nevertheless impossible to secure the large sums of money imperatively needed for war expenses by having recourse solely to intensive taxation.

Investors must be attracted by the prospect of eventual restitution and by the reward of a rate of interest higher than the current one.

In pursuing a different policy, one founded in the idea of forcing unwilling contributions, the desired effects would not be attained, either in the industrial or in the financial field. If, for example, a very large share of industrial profits was taken by taxation—the development of the industries would be checked and the efforts of the workers, threatened with a curtailment of wages, would be relaxed.

And this is pertinent to the observation of the Senator from Colorado—

The writer then proceeds to say that larger countries, countries of larger riches, it is true, can bear taxes better than the smaller countries, and he proceeds in the article, which I will not burden the Senate further by reading, to point out that which I have tried to elucidate, that where the bonds are issued in a country and the money expended in the same country a different relation exists between bond issues and taxation than would otherwise exist. This is confirmed by our experience in the Civil War, where we were compelled to send the money from great loans out of the country.

Mr. President, it is because in my home I have been met with varying, and, I may say, opposing views and much opposition in certain quarters to my support of the policy presented by the committee, that I have given my reasons for sustaining this bill and advocating it. We can not avoid, sir, some form of taxation that will bear hard on some, but we can not put a taxation that is hard on all and expect the people to respond to the best uses of the Government. Men are making munitions and men are making other commodities of use to the Government, necessary for the conflict, and it may be said that they are making profits. I can not, however, enter that field, for I do not understand what profits they make; but I have this observation to make to you, that somebody must make these things; somewhere they must be made; somebody must serve the uses of the Republic; somebody must serve the important demands of the hour; from some place they must come; the Government has not devised the method; we have not established the plants yet; we have not created them; and they are not in operation, if ever it is our intention to create them. To some source we must look. These are the only sources in existence, and when we drive them out we leave the Government, its soldiers, and all its power without any force to carry on the war in any field, either at home or abroad. While it may be regretted, and is regrettable, that any man on this floor is compelled to admit that such a condition could ever surround the Republic, we must reckon things as they are, not as we should like to have them.

Mr. President, in levying these taxes we are levying them with the conditions as we see them. We want to rob no man and wrong no man. Democracy we hope to install in all countries; but, sir, as we are carrying democracy into other lands, let us preserve democracy for our own. Democracy is not synonymous with confiscation; nor does democracy mean the destruction of honestly earned property. I am what is called a Democrat; I represent a school whose principles on the question I feel I can state in almost a single sentence: That a true democracy never makes illegal war upon legal wealth; it only makes a legal war on illegal wealth. Sir, if this taxation is to be laid, as laid it must be, let it be laid with equity and with justice, with precision, with deliberation, and with courage to do right even against condemnation from the misinformed and misguided.

Mr. President, the war is upon us. If we lay our hands suddenly upon every available source of taxation and apply it today we shall have nothing for the to-morrows by which we may subsist; and on the third day, fulfilling the scriptural terror, we die a commercial death, to be buried in the grave of national bankruptcy. Sir, if the attacks upon our country from Prussia, if from her the assault upon our honor has driven us to the evil of war, I dare apply the Scripture again, sir, and it shall be my text that "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

For the reasons that I have offered, sir, satisfactory to myself, I support the course of the committee, conscious that in the future days there may arise necessities of carrying this taxation to further limits, and still further limits, and still further beyond, to greater bounds; but until it does arise I can not justify it in the present, as my office must be to preserve, not destroy, the present; to increase, not diminish, the prospects of the future. To me, sir, duty is to "give unto all men at all times all things as time shall call unto men and the gods so to do."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there are some necessary changes in the amendment of the committee as I proposed to amend it a few days ago. They are almost entirely matters of form. I think it is well to have the amendment reprinted with these things in it, just as it will appear when we vote upon it. I now ask permission to reform the amendment which I offered a few days ago, and have a reprint made, so that we may have it before we vote this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted. The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOLLIS obtained the floor.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President—

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to call attention to a statement in the RECORD of yesterday to which I direct the particular attention of the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. It appears on page 6568. I think there must be an error in the figures:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was basing his figures upon the first amendment of the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. In order that I may have this matter entirely clear in my mind, I wish to ask a question: I understand the Senator from Utah to state that the amount of taxes which a corporation earning 300 per cent of what it earned during the prewar period would pay under the present proposition would be 54½ per cent. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. It would pay 44½ per cent plus the proportions of 10 per cent the profits would be over 300 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. Fifty-four and one-tenth per cent of what—of the net profits over those of the prewar period?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the profits that are to be taxed, with the exemptions allowed.

Mr. WEEKS. Then 54½ per cent on $490,000,000 would be something like $275,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the exact amount.

Mr. WEEKS. That would be the tax that the United States Steel Co. would pay under this bill. The tax would be something like $275,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, if the amount of profits be $490,000,000, after allowing the exemptions.

Now, I ask if the learned Senators, after reflecting on those figures, consider that that is the amount which the United States Steel Corporation would pay under the present amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator was not in the Chamber when I called the attention of the Senate this morning to the fact that the statement was not borne out because of the fact that the exemptions were not based upon the committee's substitute; and I stated to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHN-

SON] that the answer that I gave him in relation to the difference in the exemptions under the first amendment and the substitute I had not taken into consideration, nor had the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BORAH. I was not calling attention to it for the purpose of entering into a controversy; but the vote which I cast last evening upon the 50 per cent plan was controlled in some measure by that statement in the RECORD. I think, upon reflection, that there is no 54 per cent provided for in this amendment at all.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no 54 per cent provided, as I stated last night; it was a proportion of the 10 per cent of the increase over and above the 300 per cent. I will say to the Senator that the question came up suddenly, and I could not say exactly what the proportion would be. I will say to the Senator now that not only was the Senator from California mistaken in the statement he made, based upon what the Senator from North Carolina had stated, but there was a misstatement by the Senator from North Carolina as to the amount, and also a misstatement as to what I said the exemption would be. The exact percentage will be figured out, and the Senator will know the exact amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I want to make perfectly plain what I made plain yesterday. I quoted the figures that were given by the chairman of the Finance Committee and the Finance Committee. I quoted in those figures—and the RECORD day before yesterday shows them four times repeated—first, that the profits this year of the United States Steel Corporation, as estimated by the chairman of the Finance Committee, were $490,000,000; that the tax—I quote the chairman of the Finance Committee and the Finance Committee, now—the tax that would be paid upon $490,000,000, is $183,000,000. I quote again from the reports that I have before me upon the desk of the majority and the minority of the Finance Committee, that the prewar profits of the United States Steel Corporation were $63,000,000. Deducting the prewar profits of $63,000,000 from the total war profits of $490,000,000 leaves $427,000,000, and upon the war profits of $427,000,000 the United States Steel Corporation will pay $183,000,000 of taxes under the committee amendment, the figures being given by the chairman of the Finance Committee. Now, $183,000,000 paid by the United States Steel Corporation will constitute not 54 per cent, not 60 per cent, but forty-two and a fraction per cent of the war profits earned by the United States Steel Corporation upon the figures that have been submitted to the United States Senate; and the figures that are given by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that they will pay $275,000,000 are utterly at variance with the figures that have been given by the chairman of the Finance Committee and reported in the RECORD.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. Such part as I took in the colloquy to which reference has been made was in the form of an inquiry, not in the form of an assertion. What I did say was that if the United States Steel Corporation would pay 54½ per cent, then its tax would be, in effect, $275,000,000. I had not figured it out, and I was making the inquiry of the Senator from Utah, who, I supposed, had the figures.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that would have been the case if the earnings were $490,000,000 after the exemptions had been made and the rate had been 54½ per cent; but the Senator from North Carolina, in naming $490,000,000, did not state it as the amount that the profits of the United States Steel Corporation will be, based upon the first two quarters of the year 1917. If the earnings of the last two quarters of this year amount to the same as the first two quarters, upon which we base the estimate, the earnings of the United States Steel Corporation will be over $570,000,000; and then if the exemption were allowed, it would have been another proposition entirely from that discussed. As I stated yesterday to the Senator from California, I could not say whether the Senator from North Carolina named the $490,000,000 after the exemptions were deducted or whether that amount was the net earnings of the company; and, of course, the Senator knows that that would make a great deal of difference as to the percentage that they would have to pay.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to know, why all this haze? Why can not the Finance Committee tell the Senate what is the percentage?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is no haze about or around the question.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is it 54 per cent or is it 42 per cent, or does the Senator say it is 54 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President; it is not 54 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is it?

Mr. SMOOT. When a bracket is changed, I will say to the Senator, the result in percentages can not be stated in a moment; we have to take into consideration the effect upon every concern in the United States making the rate of percentage named in the increased bracket rate over the prewar period.

Mr. OVERMAN. Here we have one concrete example given by the Senator from California. He tells us what the receipts are. Is there not some way to work it out so that the Senate may know what the percentage is? Are we working here in the dark?

Mr. SMOOT. No; we are not working in the dark.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, what is the percentage?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has asked that the expert figure out exactly what the United States Steel Corporation will pay, based upon an earning of $490,000,000. That will be prepared, and I suppose the Senator from North Carolina will be furnished with those figures, and they will be furnished to the Senate; but the trouble came about in this way: The estimated amount of earnings of the United States Steel Corporation, based upon the first two quarters—that is, provided the next two quarters' profits are the same as the first two quarters—will amount to over $570,000,000, and I understood the Senator from North Carolina based his figures upon a profit of $490,000,000. Now, the exemptions are entirely different in amount upon one than they would be upon the other. But now there is a definite, concrete request made, and we will tell the Senate just as soon as it is figured out.

Mr. OVERMAN. All right. I hope to get that information.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The Senator from Washington asked me this morning if it was not possible for the expert to figure out exactly what the Steel Corporation would pay under this bill, and I told him that I would send for the expert and have him do it. I stated then to the Senator from Washington, as I state now, that in using the figures $490,000,000 as the profits of the United States Steel Corporation I inadvertently overlooked the fact that that is the amount after the deduction. I stated, I think, that I was quoting from the Wall Street Journal based upon the earnings of the first two quarters of the year. I did not have the Wall Street Journal before me at the time I was talking. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] suggested that the figures of the Wall Street Journal were $490,000,000, and I adopted those, not having in mind at that time exactly what the Wall Street Journal's figures were. I had used the Wall Street Journal's figures in my original speech. I knew that $490,000,000 was in that statement, but exactly whether that meant $490,000,000 after the deduction or before the deduction I was not absolutely certain.

I have sent for that speech, and now I have the quotation from the Wall Street Journal used by me in my original speech. I told the Senator from Washington that I would have the expert make the calculation upon the figures as given by the Wall Street Journal. Now let me read those to the Senate. Here is what I said then:

I wish now to supplement that statement by reading to the Senate a part of an article from the Wall Street Journal of August 2 on the operation of the United States Steel Corporation for the first and second quarters of this year. I do this for the purpose of showing that while the war profits of 1916 were startlingly great, they were nothing like what we may expect during future war years. Let me read to the Senate.

I am quoting from the Wall Street Journal of August 2, 1917: "The allowance of $53,918,872 for war income and excess-profits taxes made by United States Steel in the second quarter is much larger than recent Wall Street estimates, but this is due largely to the fact that earnings, not deducting taxes, in the second quarter were at the rate of nearly $578,000,000 annually, and earnings to which the tax is applicable were at the rate of over $490,000,000 annually."

So that it is apparent that the $490,000,000 is after making the deductions. The Senator from Utah was wrong in assuming that the $490,000,000 was without the deductions, and I was wrong in making the same assumption.

I have asked the expert, at the request of the Senator from Washington, to make the calculation based upon the actual statement of the Wall Street Journal. I can not be responsible for the Wall Street Journal's statement. If I had had it before me when I was making my speech the other day I would not have fallen into that error. I fell into it very largely because the Senator from Utah, while I was talking about it, used the figures $490,000,000, and I assumed that they were correct. They are correct as to the amount that is liable to the tax, but they are not correct as to the amount of profits made. The $490,000,000 is after the deductions and not before the deductions.

I explained this matter early this morning, but it seems to have been necessary to explain it to the Senate every few minutes.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, in deference to the suggestions of certain Senators who desire to vote for a larger graduated income tax on corporations, I have somewhat changed the schedules of the amendment I now intend to offer.

The committee amendment starts with 12 per cent on the first 15 per cent of deductions and ends with 60 per cent. My amendment as originally drawn started with 22 per cent and ended with 70 per cent. I have now changed it so as to begin with 20 per cent; the next bracket is 23, the next 27, the next 31, the next 35, the next 40, the next 45, the next 50, the next 60, and the next is 70. I ask the Secretary to read it.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, beginning with line 23, page 12, all down to and including line 22, page 13, and including the "bracket" of 60 per cent inserted by the committee at that point, and in lieu insert the following:

Twenty per cent of the amount of such excess profits not in excess of 15 per cent of the deduction allowed by section 203, section 204, or section 205, as the case may be:

Twenty-three per cent of the amount by which such excess profits exceed 15 per cent of such deductions and do not exceed 25 per cent thereof;

Twenty-seven per cent of the amount by which such excess profits exceed 25 per cent of such deductions and do not exceed 50 per cent thereof;

Thirty-one per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 50 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 75 per cent thereof;

Thirty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 75 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 100 per cent thereof;

Forty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 100 per cent of such deductions and do not exceed 150 per cent thereof;

Forty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 150 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 200 per cent thereof;

Fifty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 200 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 250 per cent thereof;

Sixty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 250 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 300 per cent thereof; and

Seventy per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 300 per cent of such deduction.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, there seems to be an impression in the Senate that we have by the amendment already adopted—

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before the Senator starts in it might be well to present to the Senate now the figures prepared by the expert.

Mr. HOLLIS. I should be very glad to have them submitted. Mr. JONES of Washington. According to the request made a few moments ago the expert has handed me the figures. I have not had time to examine them very carefully, but I present them to the Senate as the expert presents them.

Estimated war profits on basis of returns for first two quarters of year 1917:

Wall Street Journal, August 2, 1917, returns the earnings of the second quarter at the rate of $578,000,000, net income, or $490,000,000 taxable income.

Then the expert determines the amount of tax based upon the $578,000,000 income, and here are the figures he gives:

Net income, $578,000,000.

Deduction (because of increase in capital), $88,000,000.

Excess war profits, $490,000,000.

The amount at 12 per cent is $13,200,000; the tax is $1,584,000. The total tax is $229,892,000 on the $490,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Will not the Senator incorporate the table in the Record?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will incorporate the table in the Record. On $490,000,000, at 46.9 per cent, the tax would be $229,892,000. Assuming a net income of $490,000,000 the deduction for 1910 is $82,660,000, leaving a war excess profit of $407,340,000.

Then the expert gives the rate. On that amount the tax would be $184,186,190 at 45.2 per cent under the rate as reported by the committee. The expert says:

The only change in the above computation under the committee bill, as originally reported, is the increase in the last bracket of the rate to 60 per cent from 50 per cent.

The total tax under the bill as reported on the basis of an income of $578,000,000 is $207,292,000. The increase by reason of the 60 per cent bracket would be $22,600,000. Assuming the net income at $490,000,000, the tax under the bill as reported would be $168,250,190, and the increase by reason of the 60 per cent bracket would be $15,936,000.

I ask that these figures in full may be inserted in the RECORD. The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES STEEL CORPORATION—ESTIMATED WAR PROFITS ON BASIS OF RETURNS FOR FIRST TWO QUARTERS OF YEAR 1917.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I was about to observe that the Senate is mistaken if it thinks it has very largely increased the revenue to be raised under this bill. I wish to remind the Senate just what it has done so far. It has increased the individual income-tax schedule practically $60,000,000. It has increased the war-profits tax, it is claimed, about $500,000,000. So that is left at $600,000,000.

I feel very confident that the majority of the Senate intend to cut out of the bill as reported by the committee a very large part if not the whole of the consumption taxes. That would include the increase in postal rates, including parcels post and the express, the railroad passenger and freight increases, and the tax on tea, coffee, sugar, and cocoa, and the other similar taxes. If that is done the Senate will cut out about $400,000,000 on the consumption tax, and that is an offset for the increases we have already made. So we shall end this long controversy by leaving the amount of revenue to be produced under the bill substantially $2,000,000,000—where we started.

Senators who are going to vote to cut out consumption taxes ought to have that in mind, so that they may provide some other larger tax for that deduction. The amendment I have offered will, roughly speaking, add the same amount to the bill that we will cut out if we cut out the consumption tax; that is, $400,000,000.

There has been no explanation to the Senate yet how this graduated tax on corporations will work. In the first place, Senators should remember that business that produces only a net income of $5,000 is entirely exempt from this tax on corporations. It does not apply at all unless the earnings are above $5,000.

I now take the case of a corporation of a million dollars capital making profits this year of $200,000. That will be 20 per cent on the capital. Now, 10 per cent of that is allowed as a deduction, so that the $100,000 of profit will be absolutely untouched under the war-profits tax and the tax that we impose will be levied on the $100,000 above that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If they earned that sum in the prewar period.

Mr. HOLLIS. It has nothing to do with the prewar period. They are not allowed to exceed 10 per cent of the amount of their capital. Possibly the Senator did not mean that it would be based on the prewar period. Perhaps I did not understand him.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If they only earned 6 per cent in the prewar period the tax would begin above the 6 per cent. That would be the result.

Mr. HOLLIS. But the additional corporations we have been trying to bring in under this form of tax are those corporations that made great profits. I assume one that is above a million dollars. A million-dollar corporation making a net profit of $200,000 would have $100,000 exempt, provided it made $100,000 in the prewar period. Then, we are to apply a graduated tax on the $100,000 in excess of the deduction. On the first $15,000 of that excess, under my amendment, the tax will be 20 per cent, or $3,000.

So that if this million-dollar corporation does not make more than $15,000 above the deduction it will only pay $3,000 under what is called this enormous tax. On the next $10,000 it will pay 23 per cent, which would make $2,300. On the next $25,000 it will pay 27 per cent or $6,750; on the next $25,000, 30 per cent or $7,500; on the next $25,000, 35 per cent or $8,750. That will make a total tax of $28,300, or an average of 28.3 per cent on its profits and only 2.8 per cent on its capital. If it makes more than $200,000, then it will pay a somewhat increased rate. If it makes as much as $7,500, roughly speaking, on its capital of a million it would have to pay about half of its profits.

So I estimate under this amendment that the average rate to be paid would be 41 per cent, and that certainly is not too large on what we are setting apart as war profits to be taxed. It is 9 per cent less than England imposed the first year under its war-profits tax, and I remind the Senate once more that it is now imposing 80 per cent.

I appeal to Senators, particularly to those who are going to vote for cutting out consumption taxes and the increased rates on the Postal Service, to vote for this comparatively small increase on corporation war profits in order that we may allow for the deduction we intend to vote for later.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator why he changed the first bracket from 12 to 20 per cent?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because I was appealed to by some who did not want to make the increase on the first as large as on the other brackets. I explained at some length the rate in war profits. I could not see the difference, but the Senate did not take that view of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What was the purpose of making the increase at all? What was the real object sought to be obtained?

Mr. HOLLIS. In order to get more revenue.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And what was there in the Senator's mind which suggested the gradations which appear in his amendment?

Mr. HOLLIS. The amendment the committee suggested imposes an average rate of 31 per cent. The English rate in the first year was 50 per cent. I offered that yesterday and it was rejected. My hope is that the Senate will be willing to go halfway between the average rate proposed by the committee and the first rate imposed by England. So I aim to make it substantially 40 per cent. In order to do that, I added 10 per cent to the committee's estimated 31 per cent and reached this basis.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator now, I think, has stated the proposition on which his amendment is founded, that he is seeking to derive a certain percentage of the whole, regardless of the rate on excess profits.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator is wrong about that, because this graduated scale is based upon the idea of imposing a larger tax on the larger excess profits, and I have adopted that general plan.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is quite true with the graduated tax, but yet somehow or other it seems to me that the Senator has in mind that the thing which ought to be done is to derive a certain percentage of the whole of the excess profits of all industry, regardless of the real purpose of the gradation. In other words, he is making the standard a certain percentage of the whole, and he is making the gradation for the sole purpose of finally reaching this 1 per cent of the whole of the excess profits.

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly. I do not see how else anyone could do. That is exactly what the committee must have done. You must begin somewhere and end somewhere and have a certain average.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The committee, as I recall, did not try to do that. What the committee sought to do, if I understood the reasoning of the members in the committee room, was to put a graduated tax in such a manner as would not seriously cripple the business interests of the country. It was assumed that the business which was earning only a small percentage in excess of what it did prior to the war ought not to pay the same percentage of an excess-profits tax as the concern which was earning a much larger percentage over its prewar earnings; and the principle which was sought to be injected into the bill was to grade that in proportion to the limited earnings on the one hand and the large increased earnings upon the other. We did not start in to say that we thought that all incomes ought to contribute a certain amount and then grade it for the purpose of raising that percentage. So I would still like to know what underlying principle there is involved here which causes the Senator to increase his first bracket from 12 per cent to 20 per cent?

Mr. HOLLIS. Exactly the same as the Senator has explained the committee undertook to do. I wanted to raise so much revenue. I looked the field over and saw where the wealth is to be taxed. I have adopted the committee's scheme in toto, except that I have imposed a somewhat higher rate on each bracket. The committee can not give me any reason for adopting 12 per cent instead of 10 or 15 or 20. That is their guess, and, judging from the guesses that have been made on this floor by the committee, they do not agree very well on anything.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then, may I ask the Senator why he increases the bracket for 8 per cent—the first bracket—by only 7 per cent, and still the next one by 7 per cent, and the next one by only 6 per cent, and the next two by 5 per cent, and the next three or four by 5 per cent? What was in the Senator's mind in suggesting the difference in changing the rate there?

Mr. HOLLIS. I will tell the Senator when he tells me what the committee had in mind when they increased the first by 4, and the next by 4, and the next by 5, and the next by 5, and the next by 5, and so on up to 10. It is just a guess. My judgment is my own. It may not be as good as the committee's; it may be worse or it may be better. I have merely taken the general plan and have added it up so as to produce $400,000,000 more revenue.

I merely want a reason. I can ask any member of the committee. You can not justify it; you can not prove it. All you can do is to use your best judgment. The committee used its best judgment. I think it is a pretty good judgment, considering it is the Finance Committee; but I think the Senate will have a better judgment upon it, because the Senate has been laboring with this thing for months and has not gotten befogged by the maze. At best it is a guess and it is a judgment. We treat the little fellow considerably better than we do the big fellow. I did have a plan. I will tell the Senator. I thought 20 per cent was a small amount to take from the excess over 10 per cent of the capital from the smallest one we taxed, and that is only 8 per cent above what the committee thought was a good small one. Then I increased what the committee thought was a very large one by 10 per cent and got 7 per cent. Then, in approaching those I jumped once 3 per cent, I jumped three times 4 per cent, I jumped three times 5 per cent, and the last time 10 per cent twice. I do not know that the Senator can tell what their scheme was. The Senate can decide which is the best.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not seen the Senator's amendment, but I wish to ask him if I understand it correctly, because I want it correct before I undertake to make certain computations that I intend to make and call the attention of the Senate to them. The first is the increase from 12 to 20.

Mr. HOLLIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will give them just as I did, and he can compare them with the committee rate.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to get the increases.

Mr. HOLLIS. Twenty, twenty-three, twenty-seven, thirty-one, thirty-five, forty, forty-five, fifty, sixty, seventy.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understood it when the amendment was read, but it was read so fast that I did not know but that there was some error. I wanted, before I made the computation, to be sure that it would be correct.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I wish to state a few of the reasons for supporting the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. I have voted for the higher rates proposed here before the Senate but the Senate has seen fit to defeat all attempts to impose these higher taxes. I think this defeat is only temporary. I think if the war continues for another year the amendments that have been offered will be exceeded in amount and that the Senate will go on record in favor of higher taxes than any which have been proposed.

If we bond ourselves much higher than it is proposed we bond ourselves for the fiscal year ending July 1, we may have to go still higher, because the time may come when we can not float bonds any more. The reason why I think we ought to raise the greatest amount of taxes that we can at this time is that we ought to raise taxes while we have conditions that make tax paying easy. We ought to reserve our credit for such time as we may need to call upon it.

There have been various estimates here as to the amount of money that we must obtain for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1918. They range all the way from $23,000,000,000 down to $17,000,000,000. If we raise under the existing law and the bill as now proposed by the Senate committee, that is to say, $3,300,000,000, and we are obliged to obtain a total of $23,000,000,000, it is quite evident that the remaining $18,000,000,000 will have to come from bonds or notes. That will mean that the ratio of taxes to the amount to be raised by bonds will be about one to five.

With the world in the condition that it is in, with the limited market for the sale of our bonds, which means virtually that all our bonds must be sold here at home, it does seem to me that we are doing a very imprudent thing if we adopt a policy of selling bonds to the amount that is proposed and straining our credit to the utmost. You can not sell any more bonds than our own people can take. How many billions of bonds can our people digest? The time may come when business will not be so good as it is now, when not so much money will be made, when profits will be less and incomes lower, and if then we find ourselves in a position where the bond-buying capacity of our people has reached a limit, how are we then going to raise the necessary money?

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President—

Mr. HUSTING. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. Does not the Senator think that we will have a greater market for our bonds if we allow the corporations to go on and prosper and expand so that they will increase in their industry, and we can raise greater taxes later and also have a greater market for our bonds?

Mr. HUSTING. Of course we want to go on and have our corporations prosper and expand their business and increase their industry, but if we raise the money we need on bonds and little taxes, I do not think we can raise more taxes later nor sell as many bonds. I think just the contrary. I think if we bond ourselves down, or mortgage ourselves down, to thirty or forty billion dollars, we will have a hard time selling the bonds to those who have the money, because they will not think it is a very good investment.

It has been said here that we must have bonds. It is true that we must have bonds for every dollar that we do not raise by taxes; but the contrary is true, that every dollar that we do raise by taxes means a reduction of one dollar in bonds, and every billion dollars we raise by taxes means a billion dollars less in bonds. Not only does it mean that, but it means the interest on a billion dollars' worth of bonds. If we bond ourselves with $30,000,000,000 and have to raise the interest to 5 per cent, it means not only that we have got a bonded indebtedness of $30,000,000,000 but an annual interest bill of one billion and a half dollars; that is to say, one billion and a half a year, which is more than one Congress usually votes for the whole running expenses of the Government.

I think this is a truism. I do not see how there can be any question about the provision that the less bonds we sell now and the more money we raise by taxes the better our credit will be and the easier it will be to sell bonds when we have got to call upon our credit for the money necessary to conduct the war.

I do not think it is good financiering to levy small taxes and issue immense bonds until and unless we have to. I do not claim to be an expert in financiering. I am a mere layman on that proposition; but it seems to me as plain as day that we ought to raise as much by taxes as we can consistently with the prosperity of business and the prosperity of the people. We ought to go to the very limit, and we ought to reserve our credit until such a time as the conditions may make it necessary for us to call upon that credit. We ought to conserve our credit now as much as possible for future use.

If a farmer, instead of making a collection or getting money some other way, mortgages his farm, when the crisis comes he has not got any credit left to take care of his financial situation.

I can not understand the logic of those who say we must not tax the people because we have got to have bonds. That means to say that we must not take the money for taxes in order that we may borrow it and put ourselves into debt. Those who make that argument seem to think that going into debt is a privilege and a blessing which we should seek and welcome. It is not good logic; it is not good financiering. So I say, to start off, it seems to me that we ought to have as large a tax imposed as possible under the circumstances.

Now, no one claims that this is taxing anyone to the limit. No claim is made that the bill will do anything except that some say that it will discourage a man from continuing to manufacture. I listened with a great deal of interest and admiration, as I always do, to the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. Lewis], but he said something this morning that I should dislike to believe. The Senator's argument was something to this effect: That the large manufacturing institutions in Chicago and in other portions of the United States if taxed too high would quit manufacturing and go out of business. Now, what does that mean? That is a pretty heavy indictment to make against the manufacturers of Chicago and the United States. It means that unless they get the price and unless they dictate the conditions under which they will do work, unless they can dictate the taxes of this country, they will not go along; that they will quit. Now, let us apply that sort of logic to the drafted man. We could not impute such a thing to a man who was drafted. Here is a man drafted. He has got to go to the war. Suppose he said, "Well, how much are you going to pay me for going to war?" "We are going to pay you $360 a year." "Well, then, I will not fight; I will quit. Unless you give me the amount of pay that I want, the same amount of pay that I always got, plus 200 per cent, I will not fight." We call that man a slacker. We disgrace him; we put him in jail. Now, is not his life just as precious to him as the money is to the manufacturer? Does not the man who has got to fight in the Army think as much of his life as these manufacturers do of their dollars? Is he not entitled to as much consideration as the manufacturer or the taxpayer? Let me put it in another way. The man who is drafted is not asked how much he will take to fight for his country. He is told that he will get $360 a year. He is drafted. So the manufacturer or business man must be told the conditions upon which we expect him to fight in the industrial or manufacturing world to back the country in this war.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. Hollis] leaves to the taxpayer the income which he enjoyed before the war and all the income that he is deriving by reason of the profits he is making which are due to the war; leaving to him still over 54 per cent plus his normal profits; yet we are told that that tax is excessive, that it is too high.

Now, let us apply that to the man who is drafted—who has got to go and fight in the trenches. We will take the case of a man in business having an income, we will say, of $2,000 a year. Let us assume that he has a profession; that he is a lawyer, a dentist, or a doctor; or, let us assume, he has a store or a farm or anything else from which he makes $2,000 a year. When you draft that man you pay him but $360 a year; he does not get what he earns in normal peace times. No man who enters the Army gets from the United States Government what he earns in normal years. He is reduced from the sum which he earns in normal years down to $360 a year, to $30 a month.

Not only that, but he has got to turn his key in his door; he has got to lock up his business; his business stops; his practice ceases; and he goes to war. He leaves the comforts of home; he breaks up his family ties, and when he gets back, if he gets back alive, he finds his practice gone, his business gone; he has lost the income that he was enjoying in times of peace, and he has got to start all over again. That is what we have said and done to the drafted man; that is what he is cheerfully suffering to be done with him without any threat on his part that he is going to quit. But if he took the attitude that certain men take in regard to their money, or if we accept the arguments that are made upon the floor of the Senate in regard to taxes and apply it to the draft, we could not get a man to fight in the Army. Who, if he had his choice and was not mindful of his duty to his country or whose heart was not fired with patriotism of the highest order, would voluntarily leave his home life, his comfort and ease, his business life, or would leave his associations and go and lay down his life on a battle field across the sea? Yet, I say, the soldier must do all those things.

We are told here, however, that when it comes to a question of taxation, when it comes to a question of permitting these taxpayers to remain at home enjoying their profit, not breaking up their family ties, not breaking up their business, not only continuing to earn all they ever would have earned if there had been no war, but then giving them 50 per cent of the excess, we are told that these men will refuse; that they will say, "We will not play at all; we will lock up our factories and let you fight the war yourselves." If we must assume that to be true, we must assume further that when it comes to money, when it comes to business, men are so selfish, are so unpatriotic, that they will let the country go to destruction before they will let the Government take only a portion of their money to defray the expenses of the war; we must assume men are willing to have their sons go and be killed in the Army cheerfully, if they are called, but object to making a sacrifice which touches their pocketbooks; we must assume that men are more prodigal of their own flesh and blood than they are of the golden offspring of their business. I refuse to believe such a thing as that. I do not believe that we have a right to assume that our taxpayers are that kind of Dr. Jekylls and Mr. Hydes. I do not believe that the men of wealth, the men who are able to pay taxes here in this country, are so lost to all sense of fairness that they are not willing to pay whatever in all reason and justice they are called upon to pay for the conduct of this war and to make sacrifices in a measure commensurate with those of the man who carries a gun and lays down his life in the trenches without a murmur.

I can not believe that Americans will not cheerfully pay all of their excess profits, and, if necessary, even some of their non-excess profits, even a part of the profits that they earned in peace times, to help win this war.

Is there any good reason why they should not do so as a matter of fairness and justice? We have entered this war upon the theory and on the practice, I hope, of universal service. Men have got to serve according to their ability to serve. Not all men can serve in the same way. We recognize that in the draft. We take only such men as are physically fit to be in the Army to fight for their country. Other men will have to "do their bit" in a little different way; some by military service; some by civic service; some along the lines of their profession; some in the Halls of Congress; some in this and some in that line of business. The great burden must necessarily fall hardest upon the men who have to go to war. They are called upon to make the supreme sacrifice. They may sacrifice their lives; they are called upon to sacrifice their happiness and the happiness of their families; and they are called upon to sacrifice their business; to sacrifice their revenues; to sacrifice everything that makes life worth living. Many of these men are going to sacrifice their lives and their business, not only in part, but in whole. Those who are called upon for only money contributions are only asked to give up a part of their unusual and excess profits. Their lives, their comforts, their happiness, their business is not interfered with.

We must call upon those for financial assistance who are best able to give it. Those are the men who will have to carry the financial burdens of the war. When we say, "You are the strong men; you are the men who have got to furnish the sinews of war, because you are so fortunately situated that you can give this service," do you think that we are going to find a lot of quitters and a lot of slackers? I should dislike to have so poor an opinion of the men of wealth of this country that when they are called upon to make a sacrifice infinitely less than we exact from certain numbers of our citizens they will not cheerfully respond to the call.

We talk of sacrifices. The men who are drafted are the ones who are called upon to make the supreme sacrifice. I say again it is not sacrifice in that sense of the word when we tax men in such a way that they still enjoy more returns during the war than they did before the war. It would only be a sacrifice if they gave something which they enjoyed in times of peace. So I agree with other Senators on the floor here who have said that, as a matter of principle if not of expediency, it would not be asking too much for every concern in the country to be willing to give the country every dollar of excess or war profits it earns. I also agree in the thought that no man ought to want to emerge from this war—a war in which the vital interests of this country are at stake, a war in which we felt it necessary to make the sacrifices that we are going to make—financially benefited from it, if his country needs that which he profits. No one proposes to take all even of the excess profits—that is to say, the profits he makes because of and which he would not make but for the war—because we want to leave him something to expand with if necessary; but I repeat that if necessary he ought to be willing to give all, just as all is given by the man in the trench or on the sea.

We are talking here of war profits. We all know that this war has given a great impetus to business; there is not any question that money is being made by the great corporations and by the people generally far in excess of what they would have made if we had had no war. Consequently, in a sense, if they are permitted to enjoy this favor, they will merely be reaping the fruits and the grain that are going to grow on the graves of our own soldiers that we are sending across the sea—the fruit and grain grown in the national cemeteries in which our men are going to be buried; and I say that I have sufficient confidence in the Americanism of those men, even though they own millions upon millions of dollars, to believe that they will never put themselves in any position where they will claim a right to keep and will feel right in keeping the money that was made by reason of the distress and the stress of their country in a time of war. I do not say that it is wrong for men to make money during the war, but I do say it is wrong for them to want to keep it all if their country needs it for its defense. It is only fair and just that they should contribute their share.

It may be that we have not gotten over the old superstition that life is cheap and money is sacred. We who voted for the declaration of war and believed it was necessary, and who now know better than ever that it was necessary; we who voted for the draft law knew what it meant. And when arguments were made upon the floor that we had no right to take our men and compel them to sacrifice their lives, what did we say about it? We said it was necessary to do it, and being necessary, that that ended the argument. We said that if we did not have the power to draft men, the Nation then would not have the power to defend itself; that we were justified in passing the draft law because we must have men to fight the battles for the Union. There was not any suggestion made then that these men would not respond; that they would not go out for their country and fight in Europe even for $360 a year. It was not said that these men would not give up a life of ease, perhaps, even lives of luxury and incomes far in excess of $360 a year to go and fight in Europe, and yet we were dealing with human lives and happiness when we did that. Now it comes to raising money, which also is necessary for the purpose of fighting this war. Without it we can not send our soldiers and sailors across the seas; without it we can not provision them; we can not munition them; we can not arm them; we can not take care of them. But when we say that we must back up and support and arm these men whom we have drafted, by money taken from those who are making money out of the war, and those who have money to spare, then we adopt a different rule, and say that we must have consideration for such men; we must assume that they are unpatriotic; we must assume that they are selfish; we must assume that they are slackers; we must assume that they are not good, true Americans for they will close down their factories and shut them up if we try to make them pay the tax. I do not believe it; I do not believe that there is a single concern in this country—and I make no exceptions; if I made an exception I would be impugning the honor and the patriotism of the men whom I would so except—I say there is not an exception, that no matter what taxes are imposed upon them they will pay it; they will continue to run their factories; they will continue to help the country; they will continue to help win this war.

I have not as yet heard any man say that he did not want to pay. All I have heard men say is that they did not want to be taxed in a way to ruin them. Nobody wants to ruin any business; nobody wants to dry up the spring at its source. It would be the height of folly to do any such thing as that; we could not do a more foolish thing than that; but why assume that we are going to dry up the spring when we only want to dip up and drink the overflow from the spring? That is not drying up the spring at its source. I can not be made to believe, or, which is more important, the American people can not be made to believe, that business is going to be crippled when it is proposed only to take the surplus which it never enjoyed in the heyday of profit making before the war, when we give business good measure for what it has usually made, and then, heaped up on top of that, another 50 per cent. The people can not be made to believe, and the manufacturer himself can not be made to believe, that it will put him out of business. We are only cutting down half of an exorbitant profit that business never would have made if we had not declared war and if we had not drafted men to go across the sea to fight the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. President, I agree very fully with what the Senator from Wisconsin says. When the so-called draft law providing for conscription of men was before the Senate I argued then—and I repeat now—that all should have been conscripted. Then all could have been used in any capacity which this Government requires, and it would have entirely done away with the right of any set of men to say, as has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, "If you do not allow us to fix the taxes, if you take too much from us, we will quit."

Mr. President, if every man in the United States had been conscripted and been made subject to the call of the Government we would not have heard any such talk as that to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred. A conscription of all men would have been truly democratic, and I am unable to see how any good citizen could have objected to it. If a man should have been needed to serve his country in any capacity that the Government might require of him, and it became necessary to call on some of our large corporations to turn out commodities necessary for the welfare of the country, such could have been easily brought about under this plan. It would have been their patriotic duty, and I am sure they would have complied willingly with such a request. If not, they would have been compelled to comply and would have been placed in the same class in that respect as drafted men, sent to the front.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his interpolation. I agree with him, at least to the extent that every man ought to feel himself conscripted if he is not, in fact, conscripted. In theory, I think every man should have been conscripted. It may be that it would have been impracticable to have conscripted every man and every industry, because we have not the organization ready to use such a force wisely, but in so far as we could use such a force wisely every man should be conscripted in the Nation's service. We have men here in Washington now, who have come here, leaving their homes and business, and are giving their services gratis to the Government. I am receiving letters every day from men from my State, men of wealth and standing as well as from men of humble means, all ready to work for the Government without pay.

There is no equity in the idea that some men are made to fight and die, that other men are made to pay and die, while still others are made to pay only; and then that there shall be millions and millions of people not doing service of any kind. We all ought to be in a position where we ought at least to try to do some service. This country ought to be welded now spontaneously into one compact force, the whole working in harmony and in the same direction, with every ounce of energy and power, so that we could use every energy and every resource and every power, material or otherwise, in the promotion of the prosecution of the war and in bringing about the defeat of our enemies; but we have not done that.

I repeat that in a sense we are all conscripted in this war. One man fundamentally owes as high a duty to the Government as every other man to do his part, in his way, to assist in bringing the war to a successful conclusion. There ought to be no sacrifice demanded of a man that he would not be willing himself to make. I do not believe there is a man in this Chamber who is not willing now to make any sacrifice he may be called upon to make in this war.

The war has just begun; no man knows just what sacrifice he will be called upon to make. The opportunity for sacrifice will be great between now and the time of the close of the war. I believe there is no man in this Chamber who is not willing to make any sacrifice if called upon; and I want to go further and say that there is not a true American citizen, whether he is engaged in manufacturing, in trade, in agriculture, or in any other enterprise, who right down deep in his heart is not willing to make the supreme sacrifice if he is called upon to make it. Of course, it is human nature to hope that he will not be called upon to make too great a sacrifice; but here is the forum where these things will have to be determined, and why should we assume that men who have the means and ability to help finance the war are less patriotic and less willing than are those who are called upon and are ready to sacrifice their blood or their life in the country's defense?

There is another thing about this: There is a sense of equity and justice in all men. Men are willing to do their part if others are willing to do theirs. This country has seen a division—a small one, I hope and believe—on the part of some people who have been against this war. They are taking every opportunity they can to block this war. We have newspapers, we have societies and leagues and councils and things of that kind, that are looking for every opportunity to come in and stop or hamper or hamstring the activities of this Government in the prosecution of this war. I know there are some of them talking busily amongst the laboring men, amongst the wage-earners or the men who we might say are in the less affluent walks of life, who say that this is a millionaires' war, this is a munition makers' war; that in this war all this Government cares about is to get the men in the field to fight; and they are going to put the expense of this thing all in the shape of bonds, so that those who toll will, by the sweat of their brow, mingled with the blood of their veins, have to stand the awful cost of this war. That is what they say; and they are working upon people, trying to prejudice them into a belief that this is a war, like most former wars have been, where the wage earner and the man in the humble walks of life has got to shed his blood and give his sweat in the prosecution of the war.

Now, that is not true; but the best way to prove that it is not true is not to expect the men who are going to war to have the money furnished to them by the people in the way of consumption taxes and other taxes levied upon the necessities of life. You are burning the candle at both ends when you do that. You are making the man's living higher and you are piling up the costs upon his back. When somebody says that this means only putting this burden on the backs of posterity, I say that that is a fallacy. When we bond ourselves we are putting it upon the backs of the men who are working to-day. They have got to pay the interest, and in less than one generation at 5 per cent you have paid the whole debt; whereas if we get it in taxes, or at least a substantial amount of it in taxes, we are paying it now, and we are paying it as we go, and the brawn of the Nation and the wealth of the Nation is doing each its part. So, if you do levy substantial taxes and light bonds, the burden will be distributed between those who can fight and those who can pay.

I say it is not fair, it is not just, it is not right, it is not wise, and it is not prudent to do otherwise. Let those fight who can fight and let those pay who can pay. Let each man do his bit in his own way. That is good statesmanship, as I take it. That is good sense, fairness, and justice.

I say again that we ought to impose and levy all the taxes that we can, as long as it does not injure business, so long as it does not destroy our efficiency or our prosperity. That is what I mean by not injuring business. There is no argument as to the fairness of it, as to the justice of it, as to the wisdom of it. It is a question of expediency as to how far you can go. I say you are not going too far when you let the spring more than run over, more than bubble over, when you are just dipping from below, where it does not affect the source and does not diminish the supply, and when you leave 50 per cent or 20 per cent of excess and war profits plus the profits that these enterprises have always earned and against which our people complained before the war because excessive prices were being charged and excessive profits made.

Remember that you are still giving them those high profits before the war plus 50 per cent or 54 per cent under the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire; you are not crippling anybody, and you are laying away for a rainy day the credit that you may need very badly before this war is over.

If you cut one billion off of the top of the bond issue and put it on below, between them it reduces the discrepancy by $2,000,000,000; but if, before the year is over, you are going to put on a bond issue of sixteen or seventeen billion dollars against a three-billion-dollar-tax bill, to the extent that you have failed to take the taxes that you should have taken and to the extent that you have heaped it on top of the pile of bonds, just so far you have cut down your own credit. If this war lasts a couple of years, the Lord knows that we shall need it.

Some people say that they must have money to buy bonds that we are going to issue at some time, and that we should not take their money away so that we may sell them the bonds later. Remember, however, that we can not force them to buy bonds. If they are not willing to pay taxes now, and only pay them because they have to pay them, then, when the Government is in its last extremity, if it should come that far, as far as getting money is concerned, how will we get the money unless we yield to the dictates of their terms as to interest rates and pay their price, as the Government has had to pay the price in former wars? Not only that. Perhaps they will not buy our bonds at all; and what then? Every dictate of wisdom, prudence, justice, fairness, and righteousness demands that we get an adequate tax; that the men who can afford to pay shall pay an adequate amount of tax and contribute an adequate amount to the prosecution of this war.

The taxes that I think were just and fair have been voted down; but the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] certainly ought to appeal, it seems to me, to every Senator, because it is just and fair.

It was said here that England started with taking 50 per cent of the war profits by way of tax. I think the response made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was unanswerable, that they have had three years of war profits, not a cent of which has been taken. They have got that nest egg. Besides the assurance of the excess profits, three years of war profits have not been touched, and yet we talk about crippling them. We talk about discouraging these moneyed patriots, and insult them by saying that if we do less than is fair from our own standpoint, give them the benefit of every doubt, resolve every doubt against ourselves, they will quit and lie down, and say, "Manufacture your own ammunition, make your own guns; we are through with you. We refuse to fight with our money. We refuse to support our boys across the sea with our money. We are strong for the war, but not with our money."

I do not think that is good Americanism. I want to reassert my confidence in these men that they will not do anything of the kind. Some of them are trying to make the best bargain they can; but if I understand their sentiment, their idea in this war is that they are going to be good, game sportsmen, as it were. They are going to come across with what the country asks of them. They can not do any less than that and remain good Americans. They can do more by volunteering and making it less difficult to get a good bill through.

I sincerely hope that this amendment, at least, will be adopted, and that we can go before the people and defend the bill. Let no one here think that the people are going to be offended, that the bill is going to be unpopular, because it makes men pay what they justly ought to pay. There may be some unreasonable men that think it is unfair, but there is a sense of fairness in the American people which has evidenced itself in many ways and at many times. They know about what is right and what is fair; and I want to say that I think that this idea of higher taxes, instead of being unpopular among the people, is only unpopular in restricted circles. I want to say that its seeming unpopularity with the Senate is not reflected in the people at large, because while they are willing to pay the blood price, they want those able to stand it to pay the money price.

I hope this amendment may be adopted, so that we can go before the people and point to this as a bill which conclusively establishes that Congress is setting out on the right track, that Congress is going to see that justice is done. It is going to encourage the people, it is going to encourage our armies and our navies, to know that their fellow citizens are willing to carry their part of the burden during their absence. We are just setting out now, just taking the first steps in this war. We ought to put our best foot forward when we start this march, the length and the difficulties of which we do not know. We should be sure that we take the right step, and keep in step, until we reach the victory at the other end of the road.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I assume that a great majority of the Senate is in favor of selecting, as a primary subject of taxation for the purposes of the war, those elements of property in the country which are best able to support the burden. I agree to that proposition myself. I think that is the general object, as I gather from the remarks of the Senator who has just taken his seat, that he has in view; but, as I have listened to the debates on this feature of the pending bill for a number of days, I have doubted exceedingly whether the means that some Senators propose to accomplish this object really and in fact tend to the result which they desire.

I am somewhat surprised to hear the statement made on the floor of the Senate that a Senator whom I know to be in sympathy with the purposes of the war, and imbued with patriotism for his country, would take by the hand of taxation every dollar of the so-called war profits of the country. I am impressed with the idea that that statement is made without due reflection.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. HUSTING. Does the Senator refer to me?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I refer to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. HUSTING. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that as a matter of principle I think we would be justified in doing it. I said, however, that as a matter of expediency no more ought to be taken than we could safely take and at the same time maintain the prosperity of the people.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will take the statement as the Senator now makes it, "that as a matter of principle we would be justified in taking every dollar of the war profits of the country," as a statement of his position. Well, what would be the result of the application of such a policy as that? The result, of course, would be that there would be no industries which might be denominated as war industries; and the inevitable ultimate conclusion would be that the arms of the Government would fall helpless to the ground in this great struggle upon which we are entering.

I have gotten the general impression from the course of the debate on this phase of the bill that it is in the minds of some Senators that war industries, or industries which earn those profits which we call war profits, ought to be condemned; that such an industry is something which instead of having the support and the good will and the encouragement of the Nation ought to have its execration and its control, limitation, and suppression by the levying of heavy taxes upon it. My view of that matter is, Mr. President, that the war industries of the country, every legitimate one of them, being essential to the conduct of the war, instead of being regarded as an abuse, instead of those who are engaged in them being denounced as coining money out of the blood of our young men—and there never was anything more erroneous than any such statement—ought to have the encouragement of the Government in every legitimate way and to the greatest possible extent consistent with the necessities of a just taxation.

What are the war industries of the country? They are not all octopuses. A good many of them are instituted and carried on by individuals and small business concerns starting into some particular enterprise for the purpose of manufacturing some war supply, to carry on businesses which must come to an end when the war is over, but which in the aggregate make up that enormous volume of supplies of every kind, whether they be food or fuel or munitions of war, upon which the liberties and independence of the Nation must be sustained. Now, are we going to set those people who are engaged in that sort of an industry, in a crisis of this kind, off by themselves, into a class upon which we heap obloquy and execration, as men who are profiting out of the distress of the country?

What are your soldiers in the field going to do if there is not somebody back at home working to supply them? I say, Mr. President, that a citizen of this country, whether he is a man of large or small means, a mechanic or a man with pick and shovel, who puts those means to work to supply the Army, to supply the needs of the Nation, is performing just as essential a service as the man who volunteers for personal service on the field of battle.

That brings to my mind another suggestion in that connection—that there seems to be an assumption in the debate in certain quarters upon this part of the bill that there are two separate and distinct classes in the conduct of this war—one those who fight, and the other those who possess the wealth and pay the taxes of the country—as though they did not merge into each other, as though it were not true that, as a matter of fact, all pay taxes and all are equally liable for military service.

Does the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator suppose that a man whose patriotism has induced him, as it has induced thousands and tens of thousands of the best of our youth, to give his personal services wherever his Government may send him in this war is exempt from taxation upon his possessions or his inheritances, whatever they may be? The man who engages in industry, unless he be a laboring man performing some mechanical or industrial work which is regarded as essential to the maintenance of the war, does not thereby escape the obligation of personal service as a soldier. If he is merely a man who owns property, that is no ground of exemption. If he is merely a man who has an interest in the way of an investment in some war industry, that does not exempt him from shedding his blood as well as paying his share of the taxes for the support of the war; and yet one would suppose so from listening to a portion of the debate upon this bill.

There has been, Mr. President, a disposition to place before the country a picture of mere bloated wealth—property interests fattening and battenning upon the distress and the necessities of the country—a picture which might have disastrous results if it were believed by the great masses of the people of this country who, after all, constitute its strength, not only for fighting its battles but, in the last resort, after you have exhausted superfluous wealth, for its finances as well. If they are to follow the lead of their supposed leaders to get their ideas from this apparent attempt to array class against class, do Senators imagine that it would promote the unity of action of a great and patriotic people, to bring about a successful conclusion of this war in which, now that we have undertaken it, all that we have or ever hope to have is involved?

Why, Mr. President, I say that for a man who claims to have a following in the public opinion of this country to go before those people who wait upon his word for advice, for information, for the policies which ought to control the conduct of the war, and, by arguments of that kind, to stir up prejudices which are unfounded in fact, which are contrary to the fact, which do an injustice to the character and the disposition, as a whole, of the people who own the property of the country, great and small, is an attack upon the efficiency of the country, and in its effect, at least, is very far from the result which a patriotic citizen, such as I know some of the Senators who argue along that line to be, would desire.

Mr. President, taking the proposition that I stated a moment ago—and I think it is a reasonable one—that the first subject of taxation which we seize upon for heavy and special taxes on account of the war ought to be those possessions which the people can best afford to part with—are we going to accomplish that result by increasing to what might be denominated an exorbitant amount the rates of the war-profits tax? Let us consider it just for a moment. It seems to have been assumed, strange to say, that the result would be only to tax the rich; and I understand that when we hear it argued that we must conscript, as the term is, the wealth of the country, Senators do not mean all the holdings of the masses of the people, great in the aggregate but small in individual possession—but that they mean the great fortunes of the land—the possessions of the rich. You want to take all of the war profits, you say. Do you want to take a part of the wages of the carpenter whose wages are increased by reason of the war, and yet who still receives no more than enough to support himself and his family in decency, if even in comfort?

Do you want to take all from some individual who may possess a share of stock in a corporation which is engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war, or the production of clothing or equipment for our soldiers, because it earns a profit which it has not heretofore earned, and yet after all is but a pittance to the holder of a small amount of that stock, and say that that is in pursuance of the policy of "conscripting wealth"? Yet that would be the result of the piling up of rate upon rate upon the earnings of every share of stock of every industry which may be engaged in producing food, fuel, or other war supplies. You propose to take some inventor, for instance, who is spurred to mental activity by the stress in which the country is engaged, actuated by patriotic motives to do something to solve perhaps some mechanical problem which this war has raised, who may get a little support to engage with small capital in some small industry, all of whose profits are "war profits," is it in pursuance of a wise policy to take 75 per cent of his earnings which in the aggregate may be but a small income to the individual, solely because he has committed the offense of engaging in a "war industry"?

I voted here the other day for the highest rate proposed for a system of graduated income taxes. That policy and object would be to lay the heaviest burden of taxation upon the richest individuals—and, after all, natural persons are the ones upon whom the ultimate burden of taxation rests. It rests upon them and their families, their wives and their children, natural persons of flesh and blood, who need food, who need fuel, who need clothing, who need houses to shelter them from winter's winds—and it should be the aim of the law to preserve these necessities to each family without unnecessary burdens. You can not hurt the artificial corporation physically, because it has no physical being, and if you take a tax from it without discrimination between little and big stockholders it falls at last upon those of small incomes with equal weight as upon the great.

These profits go into the pockets of some natural persons who ultimately must suffer whatever is to be suffered from the financial burdens of the war, and in a scientific scheme of taxation we should look into the most remote recesses of the disposition of this money which is earned from the industries of the land, and consider the ultimate effect of the taxes which are to be levied, so that those individuals who receive portions of these earnings, whether from war industry or from something else, who have no more than is necessary for the decent support of themselves and families, shall not be taxed at the same rate as his wealthy associate.

I say this, and think it can be defended before the people of the country, because I believe in the intelligence of the popular judgment upon this or upon any other proposition, when they are fully informed. I would postpone laying the burden upon the poor until other resources have been exhausted, even though his income is from a "war industry." But looking into the ultimate disposition of the profits of "war industry," if you find them in the possession of those who have more than they need; who have a superfluity, which does not benefit them because it is more than their ingenuity, or even their extravagance or disposition could find means to expend, I say—and that also can be justified before the country—that should be selected as the first subject of taxation for raising the extraordinary revenue which the Government must have in this extraordinary time.

It seems to me, Mr. President, we should not start out with a bludgeon here in this matter of framing a tax system, running out and merely trying to find a big corporation somewhere, without regard to consequences. Nobody has denounced the abuses of big corporations more emphatically, at least, than

I have myself. I am fully aware of their abuses and I am ready and expect to continue to denounce them and to curb them whenever the people's will may find means to do so. But to say, when we are starting out to erect machinery of a well-considered tax which should do justice to all our people, that merely because there is in front of you a giant concern, though in the aggregate it is composed of the resources of many individuals, that the first thing we must do is to hit it on the head with our bludgeon, will not contribute to the success of the war nor to a just distribution of the tax. I think the people of the country understand this.

I do believe that it is legitimate and proper to levy a heavy tax upon war profits even in the hands of the original producer, corporation or otherwise, partnership or individual, or any one of the myriad forms which war industry may take. But still I think there must be a line drawn somewhere. Some Senators apparently think that there ought not to be any line at all, that we ought to take it all. If you take it all, as I said before, that would put a blight upon the conduct of the war, and the quicker the better we could make terms of peace to save our face and get out of it. But I do not understand that is our purpose.

Other Senators seems to think that there ought to be possibly a line drawn somewhere, but apparently they only want to draw it so as to leave a margin of these so-called war profits in the hands of those who by their industry and patriotic endeavor produce them, as a sop to public opinion, just enough to say you are not taking it all. They propose something like 80 or 90 per cent. I do not think that the line ought to be drawn there, at least not now.

I believe in raising a large proportion of the revenue, which the Government must have for the war by taxation, but I do not believe in raising it all this year. I know that a great many of the expenditures for which these vast sums are being appropriated are not current expenditures, nor annual expenditures. Some of them are biennial and some triennial and some perennial. Some of them are permanent investments which will be more valuable at the end of this generation than they are now. There is no occasion why we should undertake in a superexcess of zeal, in pursuance of a policy of taxation in preference to bonds, to pay for them all this year. We can pay a part of it next year, and a part of it the year after next. This is not a tax bill for a generation. Presumably it is a tax bill for 1918, and for the emergencies of the hour. But all of the equipments and investments that are provided for in those expenditures are not merely for the hour or the day. Some of them of course will recur from year to year, but others will not.

So, Mr. President, drawing a line as to where we should stop in taxation of war profits in the hands of the producer, whether individual, partnership, or corporation, I think that instead of taking all, or nearly all, regardless of its distribution to its various owners, a more discriminating course should be pursued. The true policy of an adequate taxation of wealth is to seek its real possession, in the hands of its real owners.

Those who receive large shares of war profits in the final distribution should pay a heavier tax than those who receive but a small income therefrom. So that in the cutting off indiscriminately of war profits without regard to large or small shareholders and considering the necessity and service of "war industry," the line should be drawn at the first point where we can desist and at the same time raise sufficient revenues to meet the needs of the Government. The remaining share of those deemed proper to take should be reached by a properly graduated income tax, which should exempt the small share and impose a surtax upon the great.

I do not know that I have anything else to say. I felt like saying this much in explanation of my vote against 72 or 73 or 80 per cent of taxes upon war profits. I shall vote for the committee amendment, because, in my judgment, it will raise a sufficient portion of the revenues needed to meet the obligations of the Government for this year that should be raised this year from that source. If it should become necessary later—and it may become necessary later—to increase those rates we will increase them, but I would much prefer, as I said before, not to increase the rates upon the small incomes but upon the large incomes from war profits rather than to levy them indiscriminately upon the vital industries of the land. I would rather tax wealth as wealth than industry as industry.

Some people have talked about these profits which they say are being earned out of the necessities of the country as though it was a sordid thing. It is not wealth merely as wealth, but it comes from the industry and the genius of inventive minds, the study of the scientist, the skill of the engineer, the business ability of operators, the labor of thousands, the investment of the rich, and the toil of the poor, all exerted together in the most vital service of the Nation in its greatest need.

You say conscript the wealth of the country. Do you mean by that the savings of the poor in the savings banks and in the insurance companies?

That is the real wealth of the land, but you do not propose to take it from the pitiful hands of the toilers whose accumulations it represents—not even though it may be invested in a "war industry." What you mean by "conscripting the wealth of the country" is the taxation of that surplus share of the wealth accumulated by individuals. So while taxing it as war profits, it is well to avoid such extremes as would impose an undue burden upon him who has but a small income, even though it be from war profits, and to guard against the cutting off of ample war supplies. "War industry" in itself is not deserving of condemnation. The lives of our soldiers and the salvation of the country depend upon it. So far from earning profits "out of the cruel necessities of war," it is in relief of those necessities and so far from being the "price of blood," as has been charged, it is for the protection and comfort of our beloved soldiers at the front and is essential to the victory of our cause.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to say to the Senate that I have had for days a very important amendment pending to the bill. We must vote at 5 o'clock, and I express the hope that Senators will use all possible dispatch, that they will speak as briefly as possible, and that we may vote promptly in their order on the amendments that have been discussed, and that in all fairness I may have an opportunity to put my amendment before the Senate and explain it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, some criticism has been placed upon the committee because it has changed from time to time the status of this bill. At the outset in the committee I believe we were all most desirous of raising the principal portion of the taxes from what is called war profits. It seemed but fair that the profits made as a result of the war should bear the expenses of the war, and every member of the committee started out with the earnest hope that a large part of the war burden might be carried by war profits. But more and more, when we studied the question, we became convinced that as a practicable proposition it would not work out for the public welfare.

I am sure that no member of the committee modified his first view by any desire to spare the swollen profits of any industry, but the views were modified exclusively with the effort to be fair and to act for the public welfare.

First we found that it was very difficult to conclude what were war profits and what were not. We found there were many industries which in the three years before the war were not making normal profits—and there were many lines of industries that were not making normal profits in those three years. There were many lines of business that, without reference to war, did business profitably, but in cycles of time, and we could not trace to the war the increased profits made during the present year.

We also found, as we continued our work, that there were industries the continued activity of which was essential to the Government, the products of which were needed by the Government as an incident to the war, and that large investments would be required and were being required and even had been made to extend the size of these to meet our war demands. Those investments were extra hazardous; extra hazardous because their profits would be limited to the duration of the war, and the investments themselves, in many instances, at the end of the war would be worth but little more than scrap. We felt that we could not, in the interest of the general welfare, carry the principle to the limit where we at first hoped we could carry it.

Further, we found that there were great enterprises which were making very large profits—almost swollen profits, we might consider them—which during the three years before the war were making practically the same that they are now making. If we proceeded upon the theory of taxing war profits alone, we would leave great enterprises in this country making profits of 20, 30, and 40 per cent upon their capital invested contributing nothing in the line of excess profits. As a result of continued thought and continued study and continued investigation, we came to the conclusion that the desire of the committee to accept the public view that the money made as an incident to war should bear the burden of the war could not practically be worked out, for that as we sought to work it out we would reach profits not made as a result of the war, and we would deter investment and check enterprise necessary for the conduct of the war. Therefore, Mr. President and Senators, it was that we sought to merge the two lines of thought—one the war-profits idea, the other the excess-profits idea; and we took 6 per cent as a minimum and 10 per cent as a maximum.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interjection at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Georgia has stated very accurately the attitude of the committee, but I think he ought to add that in the beginning the committee contemplated raising only a billion or a billion five hundred million dollars.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was coming to that also a little later on.

Mr. PENROSE. The committee was well aware of these other sources of revenue, but purposely argued that they should leave some sources to another revenue bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As the Senator from Pennsylvania has suggested, pending the work of this committee, and after the bill was practically finished as the committee would have reported it, we learned that the call for additional appropriations would be much greater than we had been before advised.

What will this bill do, blending the idea of war profits and excess profits? It will produce an increased revenue from this portion of the bill of $1,060,000,000; but that is not all of the increased tax this bill carries upon corporations. We increase the tax upon corporations from 2 to 6 per cent as to all profits, without regard to excess profits or war profits. From that source it is believed the bill will raise $360,000,000, making a total of increased taxes upon corporations of $1,420,000,000. I said "corporations," but it is upon corporations and industries, for the excess war-profits tax is not limited to corporations; it applies to business generally.

Mr. President, it is said that we should reach swollen profits. That is what is sought to be done by the graded tax. The small increase is taxed only 12 per cent, while the swollen increase is taxed 60 per cent. Take the illustration that has been given upon the floor, of the Bethlehem Steel Co. making, as I recall the figures, something over $5,000,000 during the three years before the war and making something like $56,000,000 now. Under the terms of the bill the last 70 per cent of this $50,000,000 increase will be taxed 60 per cent; the two and a half millions just back of that will be taxed 50 per cent; the two millions and a half back of that 40 per cent; and the average tax upon this swollen increase will be practically 50 per cent. That is the manner in which the bill works. The call by Senators for a heavy tax upon swollen increased profits is met by the bill, which reaches sixty one-hundredths on such profits; and the tax of 12 per cent, gradually rising, is upon increased profits of smaller size.

The committee has used facts coming to it from time to time. It has abandoned its own desire, which I believe is perhaps the first thought of many throughout the country. The natural impulse of everyone is to say, "Let the war profits carry the war burden." The committee did desire to follow that course and have followed it as far as they have found they could, for the public welfare, be logically followed. We have through this bill increased the total revenue $2,500,000,000. From the income-tax increase and from the war and excess profits tax increase we propose to collect between $1,900,000,000 and $2,000,000,000 of this sum. We propose by this bill to increase the individual income tax $490,000,000.

With reference to the expenditures, it would be a great mistake to think all of the estimated appropriations are to be paid during the present fiscal year. Those appropriations are for military construction and naval construction to a considerable extent. The appropriations are essential to justify the contracts, but the contracts themselves can not be completed during the fiscal year, and a considerable part of the liability will reach on into the next fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not mean to convey the impression, Mr. President, does he, that the aggregate expenditures of the Government, for the ordinary expenses, as well as for the war expenses, will not exceed by the end of the fiscal year of 1918 more than $12,000,000,000?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not believe our expenditures will reach that sum. I have no idea they will reach that sum.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. I will go on myself, I thank the Senator from Utah.

Seven billion dollars are to be deducted from the estimates of something over $20,000,000,000 for foreign loans. The total of the estimates for actual expenditures, outside the foreign loan and the Post Office Department, is about $11,750,000,000. The foreign loan is to be returned and the Post Office appropriation comes back from post-office receipts. We secure one billion three hundred and some odd million dollars from our ordinary revenue laws. The balance includes war contracts that will not all be completed and the money will not be paid and can not be paid during the present fiscal year. I do not believe that the expenditures for war purposes during the present fiscal year, even under the estimates made for war purposes, can much exceed $7,500,000,000.

I think we may very much more intelligently view these as the figures of actual expenditures than those much larger figures which have been referred to in the Senate. Besides, part of the expenditure will be for ships and military equipment of a permanent value.

If we wish to raise more money than this bill proposes to raise, I personally would not object to that being done; but we are raising by this bill $1,420,000,000 from corporate incomes, and from the war-profits and the excess-profits tax on active industries, and I doubt the wisdom of going further without a possible jeopardy at least of many active industries. Some could stand it, but it is difficult to classify them in taxation so as to protect against the jeopardy of many. There is, however, a source of revenue where I see no chance of jeopardizing industry. If the Senate is bent upon raising a larger sum, if the Senate thinks that two and a half billion dollars toward the seven and a half billion dollars of increased expenditures are not sufficient to be raised by taxation, then the place to raise it is where active industry will not be jeopardized. After the industry distributes its money to its individual stockholder he takes it for reinvestment somewhere or to spend in his living. We have only taxed the individual incomes by an increase of $490,000,000.

So far as I am individually concerned my income is not large, but I would be willing to contribute 25 per cent of it toward the expenses of the war. I would gladly do so, if the same rule of increase were carried out through this bill and applied to all individual incomes above $10,000 or $20,000. I believe it is the time for individual sacrifice; I believe the individual can afford, if he does not go to the front, to say, "I will lessen my ordinary expenses; I will curtail my own pleasures; and I will put up my full part toward carrying the expenses of my country in its war."

I think it would be splendid to have a call of that kind to the individuals of the country, and we should have a joyous response to it. I would like to let the Prussians understand that the American people, whether upon the battle field or at home, are all in this war, determined to maintain and protect the rights of this country; and, whether they like everything about the way in which it is being conducted or not, whether they like every reason given for it or not, each of them know reasons enough for it—practical reasons. Our ships and our people shall sail the ocean free from the danger of German submarines, and, no matter what nations Germany may call to her aid, when they undertake, or threaten even, an invasion of American soil, to the last man and the last dollar we will meet them upon the battle field until all danger to our country has permanently ceased. I would not object to adding a billion dollars more to the income tax from individuals. I would pay my increased income tax with pleasure. If the Senate thinks there should be an increase, that is the place where it should be made.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I shall not attempt at this hour to go into details concerning the merits of this bill or any of the amendments thereto. I feel, however, that I can hardly let the occasion go by without giving expression to a few views concerning the general plan of the committee as contrasted with the principles involved in some of the amendments.

First, Mr. President, I join with other Senators who have spoken before me in an appreciation of the faithful, conscientious, and, I may say, patriotic work of the Committee on Finance. We have been engaged in other wars for which financial provision had to be made, but nothing approaching this in magnitude or in the study, patience, and skill required for its financial management. By this one tax bill we propose to raise an amount almost equal to the debt arising from the Civil War when that debt reached its highest point, in September, 1865. Not only is the committee to be congratulated for their devotion to their great task up to the time the bill was finally reported to the Senate for discussion, but for the attentive and receptive part they have acted during the discussion.

Pride of opinion has apparently not blinded them to the merits of criticism or to the reasonableness of opposing views, and they have consented to or have come before the Senate with very material amendments, which on consideration seemed to them just and wise and which the Senate is now likely to adopt.

I desire to express my hearty approval of changes made here on the floor to the income-tax provisions, whereby the House percentages on various incomes from $60,000 up to $500,000 were restored and adopted, instead of the lower percentages proposed by the Committee on Finance; and also the Gerry amendment, approved unanimously, providing for the higher rate on incomes in excess of $500,000. By these two, the adoption of the House percentages and the Gerry amendment, the revenue from incomes is increased, as I estimate it, about $57,000,000 over the amount estimated and recommended by the Senate committee.

The committee have, in my judgment, heroically met and solved—in principle at least—the one great problem in the war-profits tax scheme, and that is the limitation on deductions to be made on account of prewar profits from the profits of the taxable year. In this respect the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has performed a valuable service by calling attention through his proposed amendment and through the discussions thereon to the inequitableness of the original committee plan. Although it was estimated that $562,000,000, or more than one-fourth the entire amount carried by the bill, would be raised under the bill as first reported, yet it was intolerable to think that a great corporation whose prewar profits were, say, $100,000,000 would have no excess-profits tax to pay because its profits for the taxable year did not exceed $100,000,000. To cure this mistake we have before us now the further amendment, proposed by the committee, which limits the deduction to be made from the profits of the taxable year to not less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the capital actually invested. This one change will give, it is said, an increase of $435,000,000. The additional tax of 60 per cent on profits in excess of 300 per cent over prewar profits will give $63,000,000 more. These two additions bring the total war profits or excess-profits tax up to $1,060,000,000, or more than one-half the entire amount proposed to be raised by the Senate Finance Committee under the original bill as amended by that committee, or nearly 57 per cent of the entire amount which could have been raised from all sources under the House bill. Mr. Otto Kahn, who is regarded as one of the far-sighted leaders of big business, advocated a 40 per cent tax on war-stimulated profits estimated at the time of his statement at $2,000,000,000. This would have produced $800,000,000 of revenue, but the amendments proposed will, as we have seen, bring it beyond that amount by over $200,000,000.

The increases in the income tax already adopted, together with the increases proposed by the committee to the war-profits tax, aggregate about $555,000,000—this aside from the increase in second-class postal rates, should the McKellar amendment receive the final approval of the Senate. Should the McKellar amendment fail in the Senate, or if there be no increase at all in second-class mail rates, it will mean a reduction in the estimates of the committee of $3,000,000 only.

Mr. President, one object I have in speaking of these just and equitable increases, as I view them, is to show that thereby considerable progress has been made in meeting the views of those who claim the war should be financed on the "pay-as-you-go" principle; that we should not by bond issues mortgage the future, and that war obligations, or the greater part of them, should be paid as they are made, and from revenues raised by taxation. It is said that a war debt should not be saddled upon posterity—a claim with which I am unable to agree. It resolves itself into this: Business enterprises, great or small, whether engaged in the building and operation of a transcontinental railroad line or a steamboat ferry, may build and operate on borrowed capital. And so with the great flouring mills of Minneapolis or the mill in a country town in South Dakota. And so with perhaps nearly every great and important industry in the United States. They could not be financed, and hence could not exist, but for the exercise of their power and right to borrow, and to borrow vast sums in proportion to capital invested. They have resources developed or undeveloped, and these are the basis of their credit. So great industrial enterprises all over the land employ their credit for the purposes of establishment to begin with or for the purpose of maintenance or extension afterwards. Business credit is the great business characteristic of the times. And we are here confronted with a stupendous business proposition. It is that of financing our own part in the greatest war of all times, coupled with the task of supplying our allies with a large part of the cash or the credit to enable them to do their part. Are we not in such an exigency justified in following approved business methods? Taxes in any event, and as provided by this very bill for this one fiscal year, are bound to be greater than ever in our history, or until a few weeks ago, greater than ever dreamed of. It is said, "Let us not mortgage the future." I would say, "For the sake of the future let us not materially add to the increases in taxation now practically agreed upon." Here are the inexhaustible resources which constitute the credit of the Nation. Why not make reasonable use of that credit?

We do not say to the country-school district, "Pay as you go," but, rather, "Build your schoolhouse and issue your 10 or 20 year bonds"; to the municipality, "Build your waterworks or your sewerage system and pay the contractor with money raised by the issuance of city bonds"; to the county, "Build your courthouse, construct your bridges, and take time in which to create by taxation a sinking fund sufficient to pay for the same." And so as to many an enterprise in which the State or any of its political subdivisions may lawfully engage.

But it is said these inure to the benefit of posterity, and posterity should pay its due proportion of the cost. As though war could not be for the benefit of posterity; as though the Revolution was not for the benefit of posterity; as though the success of the Union cause in the great Civil War was not for the benefit of posterity; as though the Spanish-American War was not a good thing for posterity; as though the war we now wage in defense of American rights and the freedom of the world against the most savage and remorseless enemy to which the world ever gave birth is not a war for the sake of posterity! When we consider the spirit in which this war was conceived by the Imperial German Government and the manner in which it has conducted the war, we know that, judged by all the standards of morals, of civilization, of humanity, and by every high ideal which philanthropy, education, and religion have cherished through the long ages, the German cause is eternally wrong. I have that faith in the virtue, the valor, the patriotism of posterity, to believe that such will be its deliberate judgment. Posterity will be the beneficiary of this war, and that part of posterity which bears any burden of debt due to the war will do it gladly. It will know what greater evil it has escaped.

But, Mr. President, it is not expected that the expense incurred on account of this war and for which we have to borrow will be transmitted to a very remote posterity, nor handed down for any such time as that of Great Britain, incurred in the Napoleonic wars. It will be paid within a generation, probably within 20 years. The future will not on account of this war be mortgaged for nearly so long a time as the farmer may now mortgage his farm under the Federal farm-loan act. We shall with our resources, and if we make proper adjustment of the burden, succeed in liquidating the whole without great hardship to ourselves or to those that immediately follow.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will excuse me, I should like to yield, but I know the time is getting short, and the Senator from Alabama spoke a while ago a little impatiently about all the time being consumed. He feared it would prevent consideration of his amendment. So I hope the Senator will excuse me if I prefer to proceed.

Mr. BRADY. There were some questions that I wished to ask, but I will forego asking them.

Mr. STERLING. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, it is not intended that we shall simply raise enough by taxation to maintain the credit of the Government. That is quite evident from the present bill. We could maintain the national credit by making provision for the payment of the interest only. But our resources do not require nor does our sense of obligation permit us to stop there. We must as we go along contribute a large share to the payment of the principal. We must pay a fair share, probably an increasing share, as we go. For such reason let us so adjust our revenue-raising scheme as to avoid unnecessary strain and hardship now in this the first year of the war. With such adjustment we shall live and prosper; the streams of revenue will not be dried up at their source, the incentive to business activity will not be destroyed, and business, big business, while it shall pay the biggest part of the war debt, will feel that in its adjustment and imposition some regard has been had for business principles, and it will go in with a glad heart ready to acknowledge and bear its share toward the successful prosecution of the war. With such adjustment another great end will be served. The thousand institutions devoted to charity, to reform, to education, to the welfare of the unfortunate but dependent upon the philanthropy of the wealthy and well-to-do, will not be imperiled. Who can say to what extent the national well-being is dependent on the maintenance of these institutions, educational and charitable?

And by a present reasonable adjustment we shall have something in reserve, if the war continues, and time and a chance will be given for other necessary adjustments in the future.

But, Mr. President, they say we must conscript wealth. I have little patience with that dictum as it has been applied. Have we not conscripted wealth and do we not by the terms of this bill conscript it at about every turn in the road? According to some standards, wealth is conscripted when it pays the normal income tax; according to the standards of many more, wealth is conscripted when it pays the supertax; it depends on the individual or community estimate of wealth; but it certainly is conscripted at several places along the long line of individual liabilities for income tax. When the income reaches $500,000, the taxpayer must part with nearly one-half to meet the requirement of the Government, while for the income of a million or more he must give one-half. Wealth is conscripted in the corporation tax, and wealth may be said to be the only resource selected for draft under the excess-profits tax.

It bears its share of conscription, too, Mr. President, for service in the field and in the trenches. While in a given industry the employee between 21 and 31 may be exempted because his services are needed in that industry which itself supplies a national need; while a married man of moderate means but with a family dependent upon him, whether farmer or business man or mechanic may be exempted, no such exemption from actual military service comes to the man of wealth.

Conscription of wealth! Why, Mr. President, by my present circumstances, by all my life-long associations, by education and environment, my interests and sympathies have been and are with people who could not be called wealthy, even in days when it took less to make a wealthy man than it does now. It would be the farthest thing from my thought to attempt to shield wealth from its just share of the Government burden. On the contrary, I believe the possession of wealth and the opportunities it gives imposes on wealth peculiar obligations to society and to the Government. It is fine to note now so little complaint on the part of wealth and such general recognition on the part of the leaders in big business of their obligation to the Government in these trying times. I deplore these "blood money" appeals to prejudice; they create wrong impressions and do injury; they are not founded on facts.

Mr. President, I found, yesterday, among some clippings left on my desk by my secretary, the following. I think there is a wholesome lesson in it, and I desire to read it in this connection because of some of the assertions, and some of which I think are undue appeals to prejudice, made here on the floor of the Senate during this discussion. The important statements in it come from a man from whom we would at one time have least expected them. The item is entitled "A Sane Radical's View." It is from the Minneapolis Journal and is as follows:

Mr. Darrow—

We all know of him, Clarence Darrow—

Mr. Darrow is labor's most distinguished legal counselor. No voice, save that of Mr. Gompers, is so hearkened to by labor as his. And he was a pacifist of the pacifists until convinced that a permanent peace could not be attained without fighting for it.

Mr. Darrow gave a sane, simple, and lucid statement of the war question in its various phases, but his most signal service was the puncturing of the silly but widely circulated assertion that "Wall Street," for its own profit, brought about American entrance into the war. Here is Mr. Darrow's answer to this appeal to prejudice:

"Did the capitalists declare war on Serbia? Were the capitalists responsible for the overrunning of Belgium by the German Army? Did Wall Street overrun France with hordes of German soldiers? Did Wall Street explode a bomb under the Lusitania? Did Wall Street cause Germany to violate every particle of international law relating to warfare and every promise that nation made to the United States? Shame on you!

"Why did Wall Street want this war? The rich were getting richer selling munitions and supplies to warring Europe at exorbitant prices. They knew that if this Nation got into the war they must cut their prices and their incomes would be subjected to high taxes.

And the pending bill and the war-profits tax and the income tax and what the Government is requiring of these same great industries now, is the proof of this last assertion made by Mr. Darrow. He further says:

"They have given their sons as you have given yours to fight. In this war the rich men of England have gone to the front and fought for the poor. The rich men of America have sent their sons to fight for the liberty of the world. There isn't a college in the East that isn't almost closed for the lack of young men from rich homes who have left school to fight for liberty.

"I don't believe the rich would deliberately start a war that would cost millions of lives just to sell their wares. It isn't true.

"This war has been brought about by the persistent violation of laws of nations and humanity by the German Empire. We're into this fight and I'm glad that labor is with the Government.

"That disposes pretty effectively of the 'Wall Street' calumny, so industriously circulated by pro-Germans, anti-American socialists, and other propagandists."

Mr. President, it has been urged here upon the floor of the Senate, in so many words, that war profits are trust funds, and that the individual who has war profits has something that does not belong to him; that the Government has the right to take them. Why, Mr. President, the farmer, when he is getting $20 per hundred for his hogs, $18 a hundred for his cattle, from $2 to $3 per bushel for his wheat, is getting war profits. Appeal to the prejudices of the farmer, if you will, in regard to the position of those who defend this bill as it will be amended, and you will find that the farmers of this country have too much common sense and too high a sense of justice to deny to others the right they assert themselves to reasonable profits.

Well, yes; you may say that war profit does not belong to the individual who earns it or to the institution which earns it, but that it does belong to, and can be taken by, the Government. But in taking that position you compel the man who engages in a business yielding profits directly or indirectly as a result of the war to work for the Government. Adopt that principle and mark and admire, if you can, the stagnation, the collapse of industry, which would follow it. The men who make war profits, it is needless to say, or it ought to be needless to say now, are not responsible for the war and can not be compelled to serve the Government in any industry, munitions or otherwise, unless they at least have the inducement of ordinary business profit. I grant that the industries engaged in making munitions of war are making huge profits. But under the amendments proposed by the committee, and which we will adopt, United States Steel will pay a profits tax of $229,000,000, others will pay in proportion, and every dollar of profits besides which goes into the hands of the stockholders of these great concerns as dividends will have to be accounted for under the income-tax law and be subject to the income tax. What industry would make the necessary investment in machinery and equipment for the prompt and rapid manufacture of vast supplies of munitions of war without a prospect of more than ordinary profits, profits that will in a measure compensate them for having to put much of the outfit into the scrap heap when the war is over?

State socialism is involved, of course, in the proposition that what a man makes as war profits belongs to the Government; but we have builded upon and flourished under a different social order.

Mr. President, to show some of the aims of those who believe in socialism let me read an extract here from a Sioux City paper giving an account of conditions in a section in my own State. It is a revelation as to what socialism is doing now. I may say here as pertinent to the question of taxation that every Socialist in the land, every pro-German, every anti-American, every Industrial Worker of the World is demanding that in this war we shall pay as we go and issue no bonds. This excerpt is from a petition which sets forth the claims of certain citizens who were unfortunate enough to be charged with violation of the laws of the United States when they sought to interfere with the operations of the selective draft. The item contains a part of their demands. The complaint or petition is addressed to the governor of the State:

We furthermore demand that you call for a referendum of the people on this draft law, that you stand against the appropriation of further funds raised by bonds, that you stand for this war being paid for as we go, and if the poor man can not pay the war mongers must, and if they are out of funds we will quit.

We absolutely demand that you stand for repudiation of all war debts, and there being no greater enemy to the public welfare than appointed officers, we demand that you restrict their rights. We, the undersigned, are organized under the Socialist Party and demand immediate action and answer, and if we fail to get it we demand your resignation and will spell sure defeat for you, your party, and your little nation, J. P. Morgan, as we have the people with us.

That is from one of the largest and one of the most populous counties in my State, settled for the most part by Germans. The men who were arrested in connection with this petition and in connection with other statements and declarations of theirs, meant to interfere with the draft, are farmers with reputations for honesty and thrift, and for attending to their own business. They are not the originators of this, but men higher up, who keep in the background, I am satisfied from the information I have, are the responsible ones, and the men arrested are but their dupes.

Mr. President, this war abroad—in a certain theater of it at least—as well as here in the United States, discloses as never before, I think, the weakness and the governmental impotency of socialism. My judgment is that when the war is over we will come back to recognize more fully than ever the truth of Whitelaw Reid's utterance to the effect that in individual initiative and respect for authority, rather than in any different social order, lies the true strength of the Republic. It is the strength of all true republics, and it is bound to be the strength on which the growth and development of free institutions everywhere in the world will depend.

Mr. President, some things have been said in this debate which I deplore. I discover a note of pessimism which I do not think is warranted. First, it groans not under the burden of taxation, but under the burden of loans—of bonds. What should the relation of taxation to bonds be? Let me quote, just briefly, from a distinguished author and authority on taxation, Prof. Seligman, of Columbia University. He says:

In war time, however, the argument is still stronger. It is, indeed, true that the burdens of the war should be borne by the present rather than the future generations; but this does not mean that they should be borne by this year's taxation. Meeting all war expenses by taxation makes the taxpayers in one or two years bear the burden of benefits that ought to be distributed at least over a decade within the same generation.

Further:

Excessive taxes on consumption will cause popular resentment. Excessive taxes on industry will disarrange business, dampen enthusiasm, and restrict the spirit of enterprise at the very time when the opposite is needed.

Excessive taxes on incomes will deplete the surplus available for investments and interfere with the placing of the enormous loans which will be necessary in any event.

Excessive taxation at the outset of the war will reduce the elasticity available for the increasing demands that are soon to come.

Prof. Seligman condemns the 50-50 per cent policy, which he assumes was originally contemplated by Secretary McAdoo when it was estimated that the additional war expenses for the year would be only $6,400,000,000, and says that such a policy has never been even remotely approached by any country in the world. He proceeds then to show by tables that Great Britain during the third year of the war levied by additional taxes over and above the prewar level only slightly more than 17 per cent of her war expenses. But England here in the fourth year of the war levies taxes amounting to 26 per cent of her expenditures, while we, with the $2,500,000,000 provided for in this bill and with the one and one-third billions to be raised by taxation under existing law will be providing by taxation for at least 33½ per cent of our expenditures, exclusive of loans made and to be made to the allies. And that is enough; this for us is the first year of the war.

Again says Prof. Seligman:

The relative proportion of loans to taxes is, after all, a purely business proposition. Not to rely to a large extent on loans at the outset of the war is a mistake. Modern business is based upon credit. To abandon the use of credit is to revert to primitive economic conditions and to lessen social productivity. When a railway desires to make an extraordinary expenditure for equipment, it does not pay for all of this at once—for that would bankrupt the railway. It issues short-time equipment notes payable annually, thus spreading the payment over perhaps a decade. So the merchant who desires a great extension in business resorts to borrowed money. Of course, the railway, like the merchant, can borrow on easy terms only in case some of the current surplus earnings are also available. In the same way the Government, which is nothing but a great business enterprise, can not afford to refrain from utilizing credit in an emergency. To attempt to go on without substantial reliance on loans would be to abandon all the advantages of modern business economy. But, as in the case of the merchant and the railway, the loans incurred by the Government must be proportioned to its earning capacity; that is, its taxes. If too low taxes are levied, its credit will suffer; if too high taxes are levied, the social productivity will suffer. High taxes should, indeed, be levied; that is the part of prudence. But taxes ought to be imposed only up to this margin of danger line which marks the impairment of social productivity. In the first year of a great war, where the maintenance of stable conditions is of the utmost importance, a large part of the war expenditures should come from loans. To do otherwise would be to fly in the face of business practice.

As bearing upon the question of the burden of a bonded indebtedness let me call attention to conditions at another time in the history of our Government.

In the North American Review for August, under the title, "War debt and national credit," I find the following very pertinent discussion:

For a debt is to be estimated not by its actual size but by the ratio between it and the wealth or the resources of the debtor. A debt of a thousand dollars will bankrupt a man who is not worth a thousand dollars, while to a man who is worth a million it will be negligible. Now, a debt of eight and a half billions at the present time means indebtedness of about $83 per capita of our population.

When the writer speaks about the debt of eight and a half billions, he meant the one and a half billions of debt to begin with and the seven billions of bonds provided for in the bond-supply bill.

In 1865 the debt was $2,846,000,000 and our population was between 34,000,000 and 35,000,000. Therefore the per capita indebtedness at that time was about $83, or just what it is now. On that basis we are plunged no more deeply into debt by the seven billion loan than we are by the loans of the Civil War. That, however, is not the true basis of comparison, or is only a minor part of it. The real comparison should be on the basis of national wealth. In 1865 the average per capita wealth of the Nation was only about $600, against which, as we have seen, we owed $83, or about 14 per cent. With liabilities of only 14 per cent of our assets we were certainly solvent. But at the present time our per capita wealth is at least $2,000, and probably much more, against which we have only the same indebtedness of $83, or only a fraction above 4 per cent, as against 14 per cent in 1865. In other words, our present debt, in proportion to our resources, is less than one-third what it was in 1865. With all this seven billion loan our liabilities will be only about 4 per cent of our assets. No danger of insolvency there!

And so, Mr. President, without reading further from this, we may have a bonded indebtedness of twenty-one billions of dollars and yet, relatively speaking, not have the same indebtedness that we had at the close of the Civil War, when the national debt was at its highest.

Mr. President, I have heard the statement made on the floor that the war is not popular, but where is the evidence of that? Day after day, as I go to and from the Capitol, I meet young men of the Engineer Corps stationed at the American University grounds west of the city. I talk with boys from various States. They know why we are in this war, and not one but that longs to be off for France. In this connection I ask leave to put in the Record a few statements from letters received from newly commissioned officers in my own State to whom I wrote letters of congratulation, omitting address and signatures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Without objection, permission will be granted to insert the matter in the Record.

Mr. STERLING. One says, among other things:

Thank you for yours of the 17th. I assure you that we will do our best to fill whatever job is given to us.

Another says:

I am sure that messages of that nature will stimulate spirit, and the right kind of spirit will be more than half of the game, and, further, it serves to unify us in one big team. I shall never think my work too hard to help build up and maintain our Army to that high standard of efficiency and discipline known only to a successful army.

And another says:

I appreciate most sincerely your kind wishes, and I trust that our South Dakota boys may always deserve praise and the best wishes from the people of our State. We are proud indeed to be a part of this big new Army and to be identified with this big job which our Government has undertaken.

I believe these statements, oral and written, reflect the fine spirit of the new National Army, and I believe, too, that the patriotic folks at home will help maintain that spirit.

What, then, as it seems to me, is our obvious course and duty? Is there anywhere, East, West, North, or South, in this broad land a State or section where men far removed from harm, engaged in the money-making arts of peace, care little for national ideals, are insensible to wrongs which do not come home to them, and who are opposed to this war or indifferent as to the final issue? Are there those of any vocation or nationality more than another who have shared in all the blessed opportunities of American life and citizenship but who are yet unfamiliar with and uninspired by American traditions and ideals and wonder why it is that men should think the honor of a country a thing worth fighting for? If there are, shall we yield to this inertness, to sentiment and an attitude like this, or shall we point the way? It was said of old, "Where there is no vision the people perish," and all history illustrates its truth.

Mr. President, this revenue bill is not perfect, of course. No system of taxation ever was; and the slightest imperfection and the slightest inequality will be taken as a peg on which to hang a whole bundle of prejudices. But I believe, after some study of it and after hearing the discussion day after day, that, considering the vast sum to be raised, it is as fair and equitable to all present interests and to all classes, and to the future, too, as any bill that can be devised.

When Congress has passed it, as I believe it will essentially in its present form, let us then invite the concurrence and co-operation of all the people in carrying the great measure into effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on day before yesterday I voted to place a large tax—first 70 per cent, and in the next place 65 per cent—on those making very large excess profits during this war. Of course there is an exemption of from 6 to 10 per cent to be taken out first. In addition to this exemption there is a general exemption of $5,000 to all those small concerns who do not make more than $5,000 net. Yesterday I voted for the amendment fixing 60 per cent upon this same class of excess profits. I merely wish to give very briefly my reasons for so voting and for the votes which I intend to cast to-day.

In the first place, I believe that we should raise more money by taxation than the original action of the committee fixed. Two billions of dollars is not enough to raise by this additional taxation, in view of the large amount of bonds that have been and must necessarily be issued. If it is going to take $21,000,000,000 to run us through this first year of the war, as has been estimated, then we will be raising only about 15 per cent by taxation. What the effect of this will be on our financial situation, I can not say, and I do not think anyone can predict; but my understanding is that some financial experts believe that there should be a much larger proportion of this money raised by taxation. The President of the United States is one of those who thus believe. I quote from him in his wonderful address of April 2, as follows:

It will involve also, of course, the granting of adequate credits to the Government, sustained, I hope, so far as they can equitably be sustained by the present generation, by well-conceived taxation.

I say sustained so far as may be equitable by taxation because it seems to me that it would be most unwise to base the credits which will now be necessary entirely on money borrowed. It is our duty, I most respectfully urge, to protect our people, so far as we may, against the very serious hardships and evils which would be likely to arise out of the inflation which would be produced by vast loans.

Mr. President, I wish to commend with all the power of which I am capable this statement of the President of the United States. We must raise more than $2,000,000,000 by taxation, in view of the tremendous amount of bonds that must necessarily be issued this year. We must raise enough to make our obligations gilt-edged at all times and to prevent an inflation which may be possible because of large loans. Unless we raise more money out of excess profits, we will have to place the tax on coffee, tea, and the like, and I am opposed to the imposition of these consumption taxes at this time.

Again, Mr. President, I believe that the burdens of taxation for this present year should be laid primarily upon those who have been making the largest profits out of this war. I believe this is the right course to pursue. They have had three years of these profits and can afford to pay out of them. It is the fairest course to pursue, and I have made up my mind that it is the course which I should take.

We can place a consumption tax on the people at any time. We should not place these consumption taxes on any necessities at the very beginning of the war. There is no better way to make this war unpopular than to impose consumption taxes on necessities or quasi necessities. We need not worry ourselves about the unpopularity that may come from placing taxes on wealth. In the first place, the patriotic wealthy people are not complaining and will not complain, and the unpatriotic wealthy should not be heard to complain at this time. This war is to protect and to make permanent our democratic institutions. It is to protect property as well as to protect life.

We can impose stamp taxes at any time, but we can only put on an excess-profits tax when the country is making excess profits. American corporations and individuals were never in such a condition before to pay an excess-profits tax, and, in my judgment, this year, at all events, they should be required to bear the principal part of the tax burden.

Mr. President, I have no antagonism to wealth. I have the greatest respect for these great business men who make wonderful fortunes. I do not doubt their honesty or their patriotism. I believe they are just as patriotic and just as honest as a man in the humble walks of life. But taxes must be paid by those who are best able to pay, and at this time, beyond the shadow of a doubt, those who are best able to pay these enormous taxes that it is necessary for us to impose are the men who are making the profits out of the war. I would not tax them out of business. We would not do that if we imposed the highest rates that have been proposed.

If we exempt them the first 8 per cent and then give them 30 per cent, 35 per cent, or 40 per cent of the remainder of what they make by reason of the war, their earnings, under this kind of a tax, will be enormous, and I do not believe that business conditions will be disturbed in the least. On the contrary, I think that the imposition of such a tax will just create greater energy, greater activity, and greater efforts to aid the country. If they are patriotic, and I believe they are, this would be necessarily the result. There is nothing in the assertion, in my judgment, that we will "kill the goose that lays the golden egg" or that we will disturb business conditions by imposing such a tax. Any tax that would lessen production should not be imposed. But, in my judgment, none of these taxes proposed would lessen production.

The President of the United States has told us the true doctrine. He has stated the pitfalls. We should carefully heed his advice. Here it is proposed to put taxation and bonds on a 15-85 per cent basis. The Secretary of the Treasury also thinks that we ought to levy a tax of $2,500,000,000 to $3,000,000,000. Surely we should uphold the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter. Many of us are prone to say how strongly we uphold them in this war, and we are sincere in the statement. However, I notice that some people who are loudest in their expressions of patriotism are the first to complain of a tax by which that patriotism can be made effective. The great body of our citizens who are making these profits are perfectly willing to pay these taxes. Let us do our duty and draft those few who are unwilling.

Mr. President, we must bring this war to a successful conclusion. We must do it as quickly as possible. We must have money to do it. We can only obtain the money by taxation and bonds, and the disproportion between the two must not be too great. Our President is making a gallant and masterly leader in this war. We have not hampered him by withholding men from him. We must not hamper him by failing to raise all necessary moneys for his use in making those men effective. We can not perform a higher patriotic duty than to furnish ample means to the President at this time. A higher form of patriotism can not be found than that of willingly paying these taxes by those who are able to pay these taxes. Taxes are always unpopular, and I dislike to vote for them, but at this time we can only do our full duty.

The poorer classes of our people—the salaried classes, the laboring men, the men of small means—have had their burdens multiplied by the high prices brought about by the war. They ought to be excused as far as possible in this first draft upon our resources. If it is necessary to tax them to win the war, I shall vote to do so; but the first draft and the largest draft should be made upon those who are reaping vast profits out of the war. This is but simple justice.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate for only a few moments. I hope that the amendment now before the Senate, offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] will prevail, for I feel that it is highly important when it comes to raising the necessary revenue from the proper sources.

Mr. President, I do not believe that anybody should make any unreasonable profits out of the war. To capitalize the misfortunes of the Nation when it is in war simply to make money is about as bad as refusing to defend the country.

Something has been said in this discussion to the effect that the present war is unpopular. It is not the war that is unpopular, for I think the people generally believe that the war was inevitable, necessary, and the causes clearly justified it, and all loyal American citizens will be behind it to the end; but it is some of the things growing out of the prosecution of the war that are unpopular, and the greatest of these is the feeling among the people that the great wealth and the large business interests of the country are not going to be required to bear their just share of the war burden. If we can assure the country by our legislation here in bills of this character that this will not be the case, there will be no more complaint among the people and no more murmurings of unpopularity anywhere. The rank and file of the people are willing to do their part, to sacrifice their lives, their homes, and all their earnings and property if necessary, and they simply want to know that the more fortunate man in business or in inheritance will do his part. As some proof of this sentiment, which I know prevails among the people of my State, and I feel exists in the entire country, I have here a letter from one of the able educators of my State, Prof. W. S. Robb, principal of the Dickinson County High School, at Chapman, Kans., which, Mr. President, in the interest of time, I ask may be made a part of my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the Chair). Without objection, the request will be granted.

The letter is as follows:

CHAPMAN, KANS., August 7, 1917.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMPSON: My work as principal of the Dickinson County High School obliges me to visit nearly every part of the county during July and August. During the past three or four weeks I have visited the greater part of Dickinson County. I find there is little opposition to the war and a general tendency to support the Government in its vigorous prosecution. But I do hear a great many expressions of fear that Congress will fail to compel great wealth to pay its just share of the burdens of the war. Nearly everyone with whom I have conversed seems willing to pay his share, but he feels that great wealth should pay the most, because it receives the greatest benefits and can stand the burdens of taxation without privation or suffering. All who discuss the subject intelligently are in favor of immense taxes on war profits and equally heavy burdens on incomes. There is a fear that is quite generally expressed that the wealthy class will favor bond issues rather than taxation, as this would be a source of profit and not a measure of sacrifice.

I am beginning to feel that the greatest expressions of patriotism in this country come from great wealth and that patriotic ardor diminishes as you reach the laboring class. If you get close to the laboring man, you will find that he feels that he is not getting his just share of the product produced by his labor. If great wealth can be compelled to make sacrifices in proportion to its ability, it will do very much to unify the sentiment of the American people and make them feel that there is really a government of equal opportunity and justice.

No tax should be laid that would in any way injure industry or discourage it. Taxes on profits and incomes are levied at the end of the industrial process and not the beginning, and they are favored by almost every class of men, especially among the middle class and the laboring class.

Trusting that you will accept the above statements for what they are worth and coming from one who has been in close contact with the farming class of one of the greatest agricultural counties in Kansas, I am,

Yours, very truly,

W. S. ROBB.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have believed in the Government taking as much of the actual war profits, or profits made directly out of the misfortunes and necessities of war, as is practicable, and to apply such profits to the prosecution of the war in the interests of all the people of the country. Of course we all know that it is impossible to arrive at the exact amount of war profits. It is like attempting to determine the amount of speculative damages in the trial of a damage suit, which is never permissible in a court of justice. If the amount could be accurately ascertained, we would have but little difficulty, as it would then be only a question of getting together on the necessary per cent, which I feel sure would be much higher than we have agreed upon because of the uncertainty of the amount. By reason of being unable to get at the exact amount of the war profits, we must necessarily leave good margins so as not to do injustice to anyone.

For these reasons I have voted for as high a war-profits tax as has been presented for our consideration. First, I voted for the 73 per cent flat-rate amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]; second, for the 70 per cent, 65 per cent, and 60 per cent flat-rate amendments offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]; and third, for the 50 per cent flat-rate amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. These amendments, however, have all been voted down, as the Senate seemed determined to stand by the committee in its recommendation, which results in an average tax of only about 31 per cent; but I have no doubt before the war is over this percentage will have to be increased.

As has been ably explained by the Senator from New Hampshire, his present amendment will enable the country to raise an additional revenue of about $400,000,000 and save us the necessity of taxing tea, coffee, cocoa, and sugar, the ordinary breakfast drinks and food of the common people. This amendment will enable us to get the necessary revenue from those who are best able to pay and who derive a direct pecuniary benefit from the war without resorting to the breakfast table to pay the deficiency, and I trust it will prevail.

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Alabama will yield to me, I wish to offer an amendment that I may have it pending to be voted upon when the time expires for debate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to have the amendment read?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There will be an opportunity for it to be read, of course, before it is voted upon, and I will not ask to take the time to have it read in the time of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to have the privilege of submitting an amendment changing the rate to 45 per cent of the committee amendment to 50 per cent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that under the unanimous-consent agreement he can offer the amendment at any time.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Even after 5 o'clock?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. After 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well, then, I will not offer the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator from Alabama will yield for just one minute I will ask when the amendment which I have offered is to be voted upon that there may be printed in the RECORD certain tables without reading, which I have had prepared, showing the amount of revenue which would be raised under it if adopted, and also the amount of revenue which would be collected from the United States Steel Co. under my amendment as compared with what would be collected under the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The amendment will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Simmons
Beckham	Harding	Martin	Smith, Md.
Brady	Hitchcock	Myers	Smith, Mich.
Brandeggee	Hollis	Nelson	Smoot
Broussard	Husting	New	Sterling
Calder	James	Norris	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Swanson
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Trammell
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Underwood
Dillingham	Kellogg	Polindexter	Vardaman
Fall	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Warren
Fletcher	La Follette	Robinson	Watson
France	Lewis	Saulsbury	Weeks
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Shafroth	Williams
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Wolcott
Gronna	McKellar	Shields

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, at this late hour it will be impossible for me to explain in detail or as fully as I should like to do the amendment that I have had pending for several days. When the Finance Committee presented to the Senate a so-called substitute for their excess or war profits provision of the bill, at the first glance and without a careful and critical examination I almost concluded that my objection to the original bill had been in a great measure met, but on further examination and further estimates I am now satisfied that the pending substitute of the committee is no better than the original text, nor do I believe that the substitute of the committee will raise as much money as the amendment I have proposed.

I will say now, Mr. President, that before my amendment is voted upon I desire to perfect it by offering an amendment to section 202 of the amendment which will practically put the amendment which I have offered on all fours with the provisions of the committee so far as their definition of capital is concerned.

Mr. President, I have endeavored in the amendment I have offered to simplify this question. I have endeavored to present a measure that can be easily understood. I have taken no account whatever of percentages and deductions. I have taken no account whatever of the prewar period, and the profits that were made during that time. I am submitting a proposition to the Senate that the ordinary citizen, the ordinary business man in this country can understand.

Perhaps the chief difference between the amendment I have offered and the proposition of the Finance Committee may be said to consist, first, in the exemption. In my amendment I propose a flat 8 per cent exemption to all interests, individuals, corporations, and copartnerships. The Senate Committee amendment proposes an exemption of 6 per cent minimum and then provides for a 10 per cent maximum upon the idea that a man who earned 6 per cent during the prewar period may have 6 per cent exemption and if he did not earn that amount he may be allowed 6 per cent as an exemption.

Mr. President, to save my life, I can not understand upon what principle of fairness and justice the committee can say that one man engaged in business shall have an exemption of 6 per cent and in the same paragraph say that another man in some other business shall be entitled to 10 per cent. The only excuse that I have heard offered for that is that the man who does not earn more than 6 per cent is not entitled to any consideration. That is practically what they mean; they can mean nothing else, than to say to the farmer and to the merchant and the business man and the lawyer and the doctor, a class which composes 80 per cent of the population of the country, "You have been indolent; you have not exercised profitably your talent." To the farmer they say, in effect, "Your land is poorer than the man who gets 10 per cent exemption"; and to the business man a similar answer is made.

I should like to know, Mr. President, how any Senator on this floor can go home to his constituents—and do not forget that there is where we all must go in the end—and tell them that he voted for a proposition to discriminate against those who have been unfortunate and that he voted for another proposition in the same bill which gives their competitors an advantage of 4 per cent over them. So much for that phase of the subject.

Mr. President, as I have said, my amendment eliminates the prewar profits provision of this bill and takes no account of it. What difference can it make whether the profits are chargeable to prewar conditions or to other conditions? If a man has made profits, whether they are large or small, tax him in proportion to the profits he has made. That is my proposition, in a few words.

We have heard much said here about getting revenues for the Government from war profits. I should like to have some Senator on the floor tell me where the dividing line is between war profits and other profits—ordinary profits, if you please. How are you to tell? There is but one way, Mr. President, that you can decide that question, and that is by the rate of tax you impose upon profits. That is the only way you can determine it.

Now, I want to submit to the Senate briefly the provisions of my amendment as it relates to rates on profits. I want to send to the desk, before I proceed further, and to have read the amendment which I propose to offer in order to perfect this bill—the amendment to which I referred in the beginning, which puts my amendment on all fours with the committee's amendment as to their definition of capital.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment to the committee amendment.

The SECRETARY. The proposed amendment changes section 202 as originally proposed by Mr. BANKHEAD to read as follows:

SEC. 202. As used in this title, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership is not to be included unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SIMMONS] a few days ago was discussing that provision of the amendment which I had offered he emphasized to the greatest possible extent that my definition of capital would permit too great an amount of exemption. Therefore I have concluded to take the exact language of the bill which the Senator from North Carolina reported by order of his committee. So that part of the controversy is disposed of.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Alabama a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama whether or not he has made any estimate in regard to particular companies as shown in the reports as to what the tax would be compared with the tax of the bill as it is reported by the committee, so as to give us some idea as to whether his amendment will raise more or less revenue?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am very glad to answer that question. We did make estimates and computations, but we were fair about it, and we estimated upon the returns of 1916—something that we knew about. When we made the estimate upon the earnings in 1916 we knew that we would get as much as the estimate. We have made no guess whatever. For that reason I am satisfied that the amendment I have offered, with the rates which I have proposed, will raise more money than will the committee's proposal.

I want to call attention to the fact that the committee made their estimate upon the earnings for 1917—this year—and they have been compelled to estimate what the profits will be for the remainder of this year or for the unreported portions of the year. There can therefore be no accuracy in the estimate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, did the Senator make any computation upon the basis of the earnings of 1916 under the committee bill and then under his amendment, so that he can tell us how they differ?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We took the committee's bill, taking their own estimate, and supposing, perhaps, that it would be true, and under my amendment made a computation and estimate. My colleague [Mr. UNDERWOOD], perhaps, remembers the figures better than I do; but we are agreed—and there can be no question about it in our minds—that my amendment will raise more money under the rates I propose than will the committee's amendment.

Now, Mr. President, I will read my amendment, beginning at the point where the rates are provided:

A tax on the amount by which such income exceeds the sum of (a) $5,000, and (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested, as follows—

That is an exemption. The $5,000, of course, applies to everybody. Now, listen, Senators—I may have these rates too high; that is for the Senate to determine—up to and including 5 per cent additional on such capital, 5 per cent.

Beginning at the bottom, low, so as to deal as gently as possible with the very large class in this country whose incomes are necessarily small.

From 5 per cent up to and including 10 per cent additional on such capital, 10 per cent.

From 10 per cent up to and including 15 per cent additional on such capital, 25 per cent.

My belief is, Mr. President, when that bracket is reached, when individuals, corporations, partnerships, or any institution has earned that amount of profit the war-profits zone is rapidly being approached, and, as I have already said, the only possible way to tell when you have reached war profits is by the amount that you tax war profits.

From 15 per cent up to and including 20 per cent additional on such capital, 50 per cent.

We know, Mr. President, when capital earns that amount that the excess war profits, or whatever you may care to call them, have been reached. It is a profit above and beyond what the average business in this country is entitled to make and keep under the conditions that now confront the Nation.

Above 20 per cent additional on such capital, 75 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice that the Senator denominates as war profits anything that is at least 15 per cent greater than the profits of the prewar period. Am I correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, I have stated that I take no account of war profits or excess profits; I am building up on profits, and I do not care whether they are called "war profits" or "excess profits" or any other kind of profits. I am saying that when they reach that amount they are in the war-profits' zone and have reached that point where Senators may contend that a higher rate should be imposed.

Mr. VARDAMAN. They are abnormal profits.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me give the Senator an instance—a supposititious case of a corporation with a hundred thousand dollars capital. That is a small corporation. Before the war it made 8 per cent, or $8,000. In the natural course of events, as it has happened in hundreds of cases, it may be making now $10,000. That is an increase of $2,000, or 25 per cent. Would the Senator think that was the sort of war profits which should be subjected to a heavy and really punitive tax?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, I do not; neither do I think the tax is punitive.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, what per cent would the Senator levy on such profits?

Mr. BANKHEAD. My contention is that when profits reach a certain amount they should be taxed, and taxed heavily.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What rate of taxation would the Senator levy on the corporation to which I have referred whose earnings have increased $2,000, or 25 per cent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not framed my amendment to meet special cases; I have taken no account of special cases; I do not care for special cases. It is impossible to frame a bill, perhaps, without working hardship on somebody or on some corporation. What I am after is revenue to defray the expenses of this war.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has stated that he does not think it is right to levy large taxes upon legitimate concerns that are doing a normal business. I say there are thousands of corporations of the size I have mentioned whose business has increased from 8 to 10 per cent, and I ask the Senator what rate of taxes he would levy on that additional 2 per cent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I just read the rate I would impose on such a corporation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, what was the increased rate? Here is a corporation whose earnings have increased 25 per cent; they were really abnormally small before the war and now they are normal. What rate would the Senator levy on that 25 per cent increase?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me—

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let the Senator from Alabama answer, please.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think I can correct a wrong impression which perhaps the Senator from Nebraska has, or suggest to the Senator who is discussing the measure that he has in mind one thing and the Senator from Nebraska another. I wish to have it emphasized that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is upon increased earnings on the percentage of capital.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand that exactly, and I have stated the case of a corporation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My colleague has figured it out since the Senator from Nebraska has been on the floor, and the tax would be $100 under my amendment.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think not. It is an increase of 25 per cent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, Mr. President, I have not the time now to stop and argue the matter further.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama declines to yield further.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wish to say in conclusion that here is a proposition that is simple, plain, and easily understood. Any ordinary man in this country can calculate under the provisions of my amendment what the tax on his profits will be, whatever his business may be. There is no suggestion here of a percentage on deductions, and all that sort of thing, that causes one to travel all around and about and everywhere before he gets down to what he wants to do.

This method, Mr. President, of calculating the profits as proposed in the Senate bill reminds me of an incident that occurred when I was a schoolboy. The schoolhouse was 3 miles from my home. I walked to school every morning and carried my lunch and my books. One morning I met an old farmer on the road, who was a neighbor, and he said to me, "Son, are you going to school?" I said, "Yes." He inquired, "What do you study?" I said, "Arithmetic, geography, grammar, writing, and spelling"—those old subjects that used to be taught in the good old times. And he said, "I want to submit an example for you to work out." I said, "Very well." He said, "If a third of 6 is 3, what is a fourth of 20?" That was the proposition. "Why," I said, "3 into 6 is 2." He said, "I know that, but suppose it was 3, what would the fourth of 20 be?" That is the process being pursued in making these calculations and investigations. We are supposing that the third of 6 is 3 and trying to work out what one-fourth of 20 would be under that plan of calculation.

Mr. President, the Finance Committee, as I have said, has submitted to the Senate a proposal as to what capital is, and I have absolutely taken that provision from the bill and incorporated it in my amendment, thereby eliminating any contention over that. Further, as I have stated, my amendment provides a flat exemption of 8 per cent, and then begins to build the tax on profits. I think we would get a great deal more money by starting at 8 per cent instead of 10, and it would be just as fair. If the rates in the amendment that I have offered are too high, they can be reduced. The Government will get the money under them, and will get it where all desire to get it, namely, from what have been called by some war profits or excess profits. I do not care what they are called; they are profits, and they are subject to be taxed; and when individuals or a corporation or other business concerns earn the amount of money that puts them into what I believe to be the war-profits or excess-profits zone, then I think they can stand about all the tax that could be put upon them much better than can the small concerns that the committee amendment only exempts to the extent of 6 per cent.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator from Alabama whether or not he has made the calculation so as to be able to tell the difference in the amount of revenue raised under this amendment and that for which his amendment is proposed as a substitute?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not as to the amended amendment, because that is a guess. I can not make any estimate that would be worth having when I have to guess at what the profits are. I have made estimates based upon the figures of 1916, where we know what we are going to get. Under those estimates we got considerably more money than the committee got under their original plan; and we believe, from all the estimates that we have been able to make and from the rates that we have suggested, that we will get more money under the amendment I offer than the committee will get under their amended plan. That is our contention, and I believe it is so.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if my colleague will yield to me—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] asked a question with reference to the earning capacity of this amendment. I should be very glad to have an opportunity, if I have time, to say what my view of it is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Bankhead amendment is primarily based on capitalization. Of course, there are many ways of figuring capitalization. My own personal view of the question is that value is the real basis upon which capitalization ought to be figured. My colleague has seen fit to adopt the committee's proposal of value, and therefore it comes down to the same proposition, but a different way of figuring.

Accepting the value in whatever way you choose to figure it, the basis of this amendment is on that value. The first $5,000 that a corporation makes is exempt to everybody, little and big, great and small. The next 8 per cent of earnings of capital is exempt without taxation. Then the next bracket provides that on the next 5 per cent that is earned on the capital, there shall be a 5 per cent tax.

Now, the Senator from Nebraska propounded this question. He asked, if there was a corporation that earned $8,000 before the war period and earned $10,000 now, and the capital was $100,000, what would be the tax? Well, as a matter of fact, under this bill that particular corporation would not be taxed at all, because it would have $5,000 exempt, which would be 5 per cent on its capital. Then it would have 8 per cent on its capital exempt, which would be $13,000; and as that would exceed $10,000, there would be no tax. But I assume that the Senator from Nebraska asked the question without intending to bring into the consideration of the equation the $5,000 that is exempt to everybody.

Taking it from that standpoint, with $10,000 of earnings on $100,000 of capital, the first 8 per cent on the capital would be exempt to the corporation. Eight per cent on the capital would be $8,000, leaving $2,000 subject to tax. The first bracket in this bill provides that the first 5 per cent above the 8 per cent that is exempt shall be taxed 5 per cent. As the $2,000 above the 8 per cent would fall in the first bracket, it would be taxed 5 per cent, or $100. So that the war-profits tax on that particular corporation, having a capital stock of $100,000 and earning $10,000, would amount to $100, which does not seem to me to be excessive.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that does remove that objection; but I will ask the Senator, then, this question: Where is the Government going to derive any taxes at all from such corporations as were earning not over 8 per cent prior to the war?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is not proposed to tax them in this section of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Would that exempt practically all the railroads?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would exempt from the provisions of this title all corporations that were not earning over 8 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not the contention on the part of the United States Steel Corporation, for instance, that it was not earning 8 per cent on its invested capital, and would not that exempt the United States Steel Corporation from war taxes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is earning considerably more than 8 per cent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now; but I mean before the war.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the Senator must remember that this does not relate back. The Senator has in mind the provisions of the Senate bill. The provisions of my colleague's amendment have nothing whatever to do with prewar earnings. He taxes the earnings of to-day, not relating in any way whatever to the earnings before the war. The prewar period is fixed by the Senate bill. This amendment has nothing to do with it.

Of course these great corporations will be taxed under the income-tax law. They are going to pay taxes; but the purpose of the committee was to exempt to a certain extent the earnings of the corporations and individuals of this country before they started to apply their drastic war-tax plan.

If that is the objection of the Senator from Nebraska, that some of these great corporations will be exempt because they do not earn 8 per cent, there is a much greater objection to the committee bill as it is now presented, because under the committee bill as now presented if they had earned more than 10 per cent or as much as 10 per cent in the prewar period they are exempt 10 per cent now, which is 2 per cent higher than the proposal in the amendment offered by my colleague.

In other words, if the United States Steel Corporation was earning 10 per cent in the prewar period and only earning 10 per cent on its capital now, under the committee proposal it would not be taxed at all. Because it earned up to 10 per cent it therefore would have that exempt. But under the proposal of my colleague's amendment it could only have exemption to the extent of 8 per cent, and the other 2 per cent of earnings would be taxed. So certainly there can be no objection on that score when you come to consider the proposal of the Senator from Alabama as compared to the committee proposal.

The whole difference in the proposition is this: The Finance Committee reach back into the past to establish a basis of exemption. They take three years to ascertain what a man's prewar profits were and then, up to 10 per cent, are willing to exempt him. My objection to the plan of the Finance Committee is this: I objected in the beginning, before they amended their bill, because they were taking a basis of exemption that was not uniform and exempted one man and heavily taxed another man.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Did I understand the senior Senator from Alabama to yield to his colleague?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did, for a question. It seems to be a good long question.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I notice it. I will say to the junior Senator from Alabama that I thought it was right and proper that the senior Senator from Alabama should have a right to explain his amendment, and unless he could do so before 5 o'clock it would be impossible for him to do so. Therefore, although my name was on the list ahead of the Senator, I was perfectly willing that he should proceed. Now, all I ask is a few moments to speak on the pending amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, and I hope the Senator will allow me to do so.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, just one moment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As that remark is addressed to me, I hope my colleague will permit me to reply to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Alabama has the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of explaining my colleague's amendment as I understand it. If I had spoken one-tenth of the time in debate that the Senator from Utah has spoken, I would not interrupt another Senator for the purpose of asking him for the floor. I rarely speak in this Chamber, and I do not subscribe to the proposition that the Senator from Utah should indicate that I have not the right to continue my remarks; but—

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President—

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But, if the Senator will allow me to finish, I am going to close and yield the floor to him. I think the Senate understands this proposition, and I do not care to weary it with talk. I have never attempted to trespass on any other man's time or on the time of the Senate, and if the Senator from Utah desires the floor I yield it to him.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Do I understand that the amendment of the senior Senator from Alabama is exactly the same as the provision offered by the Finance Committee, except that he substitutes a flat 8 per cent for the sliding scale, or maximum and minimum, of 6 and 10 per cent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; that is not correct. The property valuation is identical as changed by my colleague. The way of ascertaining value on which to base exemption is fixed identically with the committee's amendment as he has recently changed it.

Mr. SWANSON. That is, the method of ascertaining the percentage of profits is the same—the capitalization?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; the value. But the Senate committee based its plan originally on a prewar earning as compared with the present earning.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That has not been eliminated entirely from the Senate bill. It has been limited.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that; but when you come to fix your 8 per cent you take that as a basis from which you start for taxation purposes. So the amendment of the Senator from Alabama is precisely the Senate amendment—

Mr. BANKHEAD. I cut it out of their bill.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator cut it out of their bill—except that he establishes a flat 8 per cent in place of their maximum and minimum of 6 and 10.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Alabama sits down I should like to ask him a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] desires the floor, and I do not want to keep him off of it; so I will ask the Senator not to interrupt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will not interrupt; but I should like to have an answer, which the Senator can give in four seconds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What amount of money is it estimated that the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama will yield as a war-profits tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will yield, in addition to what is already raised by the law that is now on the statute books, about $600,000,000, in my judgment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is, in addition to the $226,000,000?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In addition to the law that is now on the statute books.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if he did not leave a wrong impression in the mind of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] as well as in the minds of other Senators present? The impression which was left upon the mind of the Senator from Virginia was that after fixing the basic exemption, then the graduated tax was the same in the Bankhead amendment as in the committee bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Virginia, I am sure, did not understand that, and I did not intend to convey that idea.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am of the impression that he did, because it is a matter which he has discussed with me before.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course I do not know about that, but I certainly did not intend to convey that idea, and I do not think he so understood me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I know the Senator did not intend to convey that idea, but I fear he did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the few minutes that I have at my disposal I want to say that the definition of capital as provided by the amendment just offered by the Senator from Alabama is not the same as in the committee amendment as amended. The words "nor stock, bonds, or other assets the income from which is not subject to the tax imposed by this title" are not in that amendment. That means that if a company buys liberty bonds, the amount of the purchase can be used as capital stock. If it buys stock in other companies, it can be used in the same way; and every Senator knows that a great many of the great corporations in this country have invested in the stock of other companies. I wanted to call attention to that difference between the amendments.

Now, I want to say simply a word on the pending amendment, offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS].

The amendment provides that the first bracket shall be increased from 12 per cent to 20 per cent, the second bracket from 16 per cent to 23 per cent, the next from 20 per cent to 27 per cent, the next from 25 per cent to 31 per cent, the next from 30 per cent to 35 per cent, the next from 35 per cent to 40 per cent, the next from 40 per cent to 45 per cent, the next from 45 per cent to 50 per cent, the next from 50 per cent to 60 per cent, and the next from 60 per cent to 70 per cent.

Mr. President, what does that really mean when applied to the brackets of the committee's substitute? It means that in the case of the small company or any company making an increased profit not exceeding 15 per cent the tax shall be raised from 12 to 20 per cent, or an increase of 66 2/3 per cent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that the Hollis amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the Hollis amendment.

The next bracket, exceeding 15 per cent and not exceeding 25 per cent, is increased from 16 to 23 per cent, or an increase of 43 1/2 per cent.

The next, from 20 to 27 per cent, is an increase of 35 per cent.

The increase from 25 to 31 per cent is an increase of 24 per cent.

The increase from 30 to 35 per cent is an increase of 16 2/3 per cent.

The increase from 35 to 40 per cent is an increase of 14 2/5 per cent.

The increase from 40 to 45 per cent is an increase of 12 1/2 per cent.

The increase from 45 to 50 per cent is an increase of 11 1/3 per cent.

The increase from 50 to 60 per cent is an increase of 20 per cent.

The increase from 60 to 70 per cent is an increase of 16 2/3 per cent.

In other words, Mr. President, on incomes—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (at 5 o'clock p. m.). Under the terms of the unanimous-consent rule, further debate is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). By an arrangement with the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. As I understand he would vote as I do on this question, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is unavoidably absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] and vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when Mr. REED's name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. REED], whom I am daily expecting to return to the Senate. He was called away on imperative business, and is still absent. He is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], but in view of the announcement made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] to the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that my pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], is not present, and I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS], who, if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], on account of illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. FALL. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 55, as follows:

So Mr. HOLLIS's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment, beginning at line 23, allowing the committee amendment as to 12 per cent to stand. Beginning at line 23, I make changes in the subsequent percentages as noted in the amendment which I send to the desk to be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, page 12, and all of page 13, down to and inclusive of line 22, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Twenty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 15 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 25 per cent thereof;
 Twenty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 25 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 50 per cent thereof;
 Thirty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 50 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 75 per cent thereof;
 Thirty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 75 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 100 per cent thereof;
 Forty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 100 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 150 per cent thereof;
 Forty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 150 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 200 per cent thereof;
 Fifty per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 200 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 250 per cent thereof;
 Fifty-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 250 per cent of such deduction and do not exceed 300 per cent thereof; and
 Seventy-five per cent of the amount by which such war profits exceed 300 per cent of such deduction.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, earlier in the day I presented this amendment, together with tables showing the amount of revenue which would be collected under its provisions as compared with the amount which would be collected under the committee amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the tables be printed in the RECORD at this point, immediately following the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the former vote and vote "nay."

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. HARDWICK's name was called). I am authorized by the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to say that if he were present he would vote for this amendment. He is absent in attendance upon the meeting of the National Bar Association.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my pair as on the previous vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing the same pair and transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. STONE. Several days ago I was handed a dispatch from my colleague [Mr. REED], which I think I ought to put in the RECORD:

I want my pair to be employed in the manner most favorable to high taxation of war profits and to low burdens upon small incomes. At the same time I do not want to vote for any proposition that is so extreme as to be ridiculous.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I do not wish to object, but this is entirely irregular and out of order.

Mr. STONE. I am explaining my colleague's position.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not going to object, but I hope there will not be a repetition of it.

Mr. STONE. There will be no repetition of this particular statement.

The result was announced—yeas 23, nays 56, as follows:

YEAS—23.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to offer an amendment, by striking out the word "forty-five," in line 4, on page 7, and inserting in lieu thereof "fifty"; by striking out the word "fifty," in line 8, page 7, and inserting in lieu thereof "sixty"; and striking out the words "60 per cent," in line 12, page 7, and inserting in lieu thereof "70 per cent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOLLIS. I ask that the amendment be read, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposes to change the rates in the last three brackets of the committee amendment on page 13. The rate of 45 per cent, in line 16, is changed to 50 per cent; the rate of 50 per cent, in line 20, is changed to 60 per cent; and in the committee amendment added at that point the rate of 60 per cent is changed to 70 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. On that amendment to the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on former votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the transfer of that pair to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last ballot and vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 55, as follows:

So Mr. SHAFROTH's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14, line 11, after the word "profession," it is proposed to insert the words "or occupation," and in line 13, after the word "profession," to insert the words "or occupation," so as to read:

(b) A profession or occupation the profits of which depend mainly on the personal qualifications of the individuals by whom such profession or occupation is carried on—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on the part of the committee I have no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to add to the last two brackets on page 13, 10 points each, so that the one will read "60 per cent" instead of "50 per cent," and the last one will read "70 per cent" instead of "60 per cent."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to change the rate in the last two brackets by striking out "50" before the words "per cent" and inserting "60," and in the last bracket added to the committee amendment, before the words "per cent," by striking out "60" and inserting "70."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California to the committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous votes, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as on the last ballot, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I announce the same transfer of my pair as on the last vote and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous votes, I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 28, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—28.

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of California to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I offer the following amendment: Strike out "60" in the last bracket and insert "70;" so that it will be nearer 60 per cent than it is at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON of California to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask the attention of the chairman of the Finance Committee to it. I offer it as a separate paragraph, to come in at the end of section 209.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to inform the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is the one which is now before the Senate as an amendment to the committee amendment, and it only goes to section 206.

Mr. POMERENE. I will offer the amendment a little later on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the last paragraph of section 200 and in lieu thereof to insert:

The term "prewar period" means the three of the calendar years 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, and 1913, remaining after discarding the year showing the greatest and the year showing the least net income, or if a corporation or partnership was in existence or an individual was engaged in a trade or business for less than five but not less than three of such entire years, then the one or two years remaining after discarding as above. If a corporation or partnership was in existence or an individual was engaged in a trade or business for less than three of such entire years, then the number of such entire years shall be the prewar period.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I understand, however, that he would vote as I shall vote on this proposition. I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], which, on this question, I transfer to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

So Mr. GORE's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. The amendment is the present law, and I think will be accepted by the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 201, it is proposed to insert the following:

(c) Incomes derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly-premium payment plan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on behalf of the committee I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I want to reserve the right to have a separate vote on that amendment when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of that part of section 200 beginning with line 1 on page 12 and ending with the word "business," in line 8, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

The term "prewar period" shall be taken to be any two of the three years 1911, 1912, and 1913, said two years to be selected by the taxpayer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment to the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, at the end of section 204, it is proposed to insert a fifth paragraph, as follows:

When a citizen, partnership, or corporation shall so elect, he or it shall have, and is hereby given, the privilege of eliminating any one of the three prewar years in fixing the basis upon which his or its war profits shall be determined, in such event taking the average of the two remaining years as the basis of such calculation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] as amended to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let it be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of the last paragraph of section 200, from lines 1 to 8, inclusive, on page 12; also to strike out sections 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, and 206, or down to and including line 21 on page 21, and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Sec. 201. That in addition to the taxes under existing laws there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation and partnership organized, authorized, or existing under the laws of the United States, or any State, Territory, or District thereof, no matter how created or organized, excepting income derived from the business of life, health, and accident insurance combined in one policy issued on the weekly premium payment plan, a tax on the amount by which such net income exceeds the sum of (a) $5,000, and (b) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested, as follows:

Up to and including 5 per cent additional on such capital, 5 per cent. From 5 per cent up to and including 10 per cent additional on such capital, 10 per cent.

From 10 per cent up to and including 15 per cent additional on such capital, 25 per cent.

From 15 per cent up to and including 20 per cent additional on such capital, 50 per cent.

Above 20 per cent additional on such capital, 75 per cent.

Every foreign corporation and partnership, including corporations and partnerships of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico, shall pay for each taxable year a like tax upon the amount by which its net income received from all sources within the United States exceeds the sum of (a) 8 per cent of the actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States, and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business in the United States bears to the entire actual capital invested; and in case no such capital is used or employed in the business in the United States the tax shall be imposed upon that portion of such net income which is in excess of the sum of (a) 8 per cent of that proportion of the entire actual capital invested and used or employed in the business which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income and (b) that proportion of $5,000 which the net income from sources within the United States bears to the entire net income.

Sec. 202. As used in this title, the term "capital" does not include money or other property borrowed, and in case of a corporation or partnership means, subject to the above limitation, (1) actual cash paid in, (2) the actual cash value of property paid in other than cash, for stocks or shares in such corporation or partnership, at the time of such payment, and (3) paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits used or employed in the business: Provided, That the good will, including trade-marks and trade brands, or the franchise of a corporation or partnership is not to be included unless the corporation or partnership made payment therefor specifically as such in cash or tangible property, the value of such good will, trade-marks, trade brands, or franchise not to exceed the actual cash or actual value of the tangible property paid therefor at the time of such payment.

Sec. 203. That the tax herein imposed upon corporations and partnerships shall be computed upon the basis of the net income shown by their income-tax returns under Title I of the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916, or under this title, and shall be assessed and collected at the same time and in the same manner as the income tax due under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: Provided, That for the purpose of this title a partnership shall have the same privilege with reference to fixing its fiscal year as is accorded corporations under section 13 (a) of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916: Provided further, That where a corporation or partnership makes return prior to March 1, 1918, covering its own fiscal year and includes therein any income received during the calendar year ending December 31, 1916, the tax herein imposed shall be that proportion of the tax based upon such full fiscal year which the time from January 1, 1917, to the end of such fiscal year bears to the full fiscal year.

Sec. 204. That corporations exempt from tax under the provisions of section 11 of Title I of the act approved September 8, 1916, and partnerships carrying on or doing the same business shall be exempt from the provisions of this title, and the tax imposed by this title shall not attach to incomes of partnerships derived from agriculture or from personal services.

Sec. 205. That every corporation having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year making a return under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, shall for the purposes of this title include in such return a detailed statement of the actual capital invested.

Every partnership having a net income of $5,000 or more for the taxable year shall render a correct return of the income of the partnership for the taxable year, setting forth specifically the actual capital invested and the gross income for such year and the deductions herein-after allowed. Such returns shall be rendered at the same time and in the same manner and form as is prescribed for income-tax returns under Title I of such act of September 8, 1916. In computing net income of a partnership for the purposes of this title there shall be allowed like deductions as are allowed to individuals in sections 5 (a) and 6 (a) of such act of September 8, 1916.

Sec. 206. That all administrative, special, and general provisions of law, including the laws in relation to the assessment, remission, collection, and refund of internal-revenue taxes not heretofore specifically repealed and not inconsistent with the provisions of this title are hereby extended and made applicable to all the provisions of this title and to the tax herein imposed, and all provisions of Title I of such act of September 8, 1916, relating to returns and payment of the tax therein imposed, including penalties, are hereby made applicable to the tax required by this title.

Sec. 207. That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall make all necessary regulations for carrying out the provisions of this title, and may require any corporation or partnership subject to the provisions of this title to furnish him with such facts, data, and information as, in his judgment, are necessary to collect the tax provided for in this title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). By arrangement I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I understand that he would vote as I would on this question. I therefore feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair on this vote to the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and transferring it to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], I vote "nay."

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. Noticing that he has not voted, I withhold my vote. The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 9, nays 67, as follows:

So Mr. BANKHEAD's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I offer an amendment, on page 9, line 6, to strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight," as the minimum rate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 203, subsection (a), where it reads "but such deduction shall not be an amount less than 6 nor more than 10 per cent of the actual invested capital as of January 1 of the taxable year," it is proposed to strike out "six" and insert "eight," so as to read:

Such deduction shall not be an amount less than 8 or more than 10 per cent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. I now offer the following amendment, to be a separate paragraph at the end of section 210. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of section 210 the following:

Premiums paid on life insurance policies covering the lives of officers, employees, or those financially interested in the company or copartnership for the benefit of said company or copartnership shall not be deducted in computing the net income or profits in determining the amount of taxes to be paid under this act or under the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916.

Mr. SIMMONS. On behalf of the committee I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NEW. I should like to know if I may reserve the right to ask for a vote in the Senate on the amendment which I submitted a short time ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks not, under the unanimous-consent agreement. That matter has been disposed of.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, Mr. President, I do not think so. This consent agreement is different from the one on the prohibition amendment. I do not think it cuts off any right in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take the matter under consideration. He can not rule on it now, because it would be a moot question at present.

Mr. NEW. With the Chair holding the question under consideration, I should like to have it understood that I have asked that the right be reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so noted.

Mr. SIMMONS. On behalf of the committee I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 207, as amended by the Finance Committee, a new paragraph as follows:

The limitation in sections 203 and 204 as to the percentage of capital allowed as a deduction shall not apply in the case of a trade or business which is chiefly carried on by means of personal services and in which the capital is only nominal as compared with the gross income.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee as Title II, War profits, as modified and amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement that I did before, I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again transferring my general pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair and transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). On this vote I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent because of illness in his family.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (after having voted in the affirmative). Upon this vote I want the RECORD to show that while I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that pair has been transferred to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] through the courtesy of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Therefore I am at liberty to vote.

Mr. LEWIS. May I be permitted to announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is detained by illness, and to state that I am informed that if he were present he would vote "yea"?

Mr. MYERS. I desire to announce that if my colleague [Mr. WALSH] were present he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF], if present, would vote "yea." He is paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

Mr. LEWIS. Again may I state that I am also instructed to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness, and that if present he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 71, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—71.

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rise to offer an amendment to the next title, which, under the unanimous consent, is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate immediately proceeded, upon the disposition of the last motion, to consider Title I, the income-tax title.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. To which I offer the amendment I send to the Secretary's desk.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President—

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I simply offer it in order that it may be pending. I do not care to take the time of the Senate to have it read now. I ask, however, that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out section 2 of the bill and insert:

"SEC. 2. That in addition to the additional tax imposed by subdivision (b) of section 1 of such act of September 8, 1916, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid a like additional tax upon the income of every individual received in the calendar year 1917 and every calendar year thereafter, as follows:

"One-half of 1 per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000.

"Forty-five per cent per annum upon the amount by which the total net income exceeds $59,000 and does not exceed $60,000."

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely desired to move a recess.

DECISION OF JUDGE EMORY SPEER.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President—

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I present a communication from the Solicitor of the Post Office Department, transmitting a copy of the decision of Federal Judge Emory Speer in the case of The Jeffersonian Publishing Co. against the Postmaster at Thomson, Ga. I ask that the letter and decision be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 1, 1917.

HON. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the absence of the Postmaster General I am inclosing you a very important decision rendered by Judge Emory Speer, of the United States Court for the Southern District of Georgia, in the case of The Jeffersonian Publishing Co. against the postmaster at Thomson, Ga.

I think it would be well to have this put in the RECORD to supplement the other decisions which you had printed in the RECORD a few days ago at the instance of the Postmaster General in reference to the administration of the espionage act by the Post Office Department.

Very truly, yours,

W. H. LAMAR, Solicitor.

[United States District Court, Southern District of Georgia. Jeffersonian Publishing Co., complainant, v. J. Q. West, postmaster, defendant. Petition in equity. S. G. McClendon, J. Gordon Jones, Samuel L. Olive, and B. J. Stephens, attorney for plaintiff. W. H. Lamar, solicitor for the Post Office Department, and Erle Barnes, special assistant to the Attorney General, for defendant. Decided August 29, at Lake Fairfield, N. C.]

SPEER, District Judge:

"The bill before the court was brought originally to enjoin the postmaster at Thomson, Ga., from withdrawing the second-class mailing privilege of the Jeffersonian. The action complained of had been taken by the postmaster in obedience to an order of the Hon. A. S. Burleson, as Postmaster General.

"Appreciating the weighty effect of determination by the Postmaster General of any material and relevant questions of fact arising in the administration of the statutes of Congress relating to his department, a preliminary injunction was withheld. A rule was, however, granted, calling upon the respondent to show cause why the injunction sought should not be granted. At the hearing, it became apparent that the Postmaster General had forbidden the Jeffersonian of the 28th of June all admittance to the mails. This upon the ground that it was distinctly unavailable. By suitable amendment, the legality of this conclusion was challenged. The court being of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to specific information not only of those features of the Jeffersonian issued on the 16th instant, held unavailable, but also those in past issues deemed so unavailable as to induce the conclusion by the Postmaster General that the publication was not a newspaper in the meaning of the law conferring the second-class privilege, directed that the respondent should file specifications of all such matter. This has been accordingly done, and thus the question is presented,

Do the facts and the determination of the Postmaster General demand or justify a court of the United States in the interference hence sought with an administrative branch of the Government?

"In the affidavit of the Postmaster General, after the specification required by the court of the passages in the Jeffersonian held by him to be unmailable, there appears the following statement:

"Deponent further says that in his judgment in their entirety the issues [of the Jeffersonian] evince a purpose and intent on the part of the publisher to willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation and success of the military or naval forces of the United States, to willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States to the injury of the service, * * * and that the circulation of such matter is causing antagonism and resistance among the people to the conduct of the war with respect to enlistments, execution of the draft, and the sale of bonds to raise revenue to carry on the war.

"The Postmaster General further states under the sanction of his oath that he is advised and believes that there is an organized propaganda which has inflamed a large body of people to such an extent that it constitutes in effect the advocacy of treason, insurrection, and forcible resistance to the laws of the United States. Upon such information, he states that this has been actually threatened, and that prominent among the publications thus engaged is the Jeffersonian; that the matter it produces to this end in contemplation of the espionage act is nonmailable. After due and thorough consideration deponent so decided, but prior to his ruling that the issue of June 28, 1917, was nonmailable the paper was submitted to the Attorney General of the United States, and deponent was advised by the Attorney General that the paper was in violation of section 3 of Title I of the espionage act.

"For the same reason and because it contained matter of the same nonmailable description the Postmaster General, after examination, caused the postmaster at Thomson to be advised that the issue of August 16 was also unmailable. Thus it will be seen that the court is advised of the concurrent opinion of two members of the Cabinet—the chief of the Post Office Department and the chief of the law department of the Government—in justification of the action of which plaintiff complains.

"A supreme measure of legislation enacted by Congress for the successful prosecution of the great war in which the country is engaged, termed the 'espionage act,' in Title I, section 3, declares that 'Whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully make or convey false reports or false statements with intent to interfere with the operation or success of the military or naval forces of the United States or to promote the success of its enemies; and whoever, when the United States is at war, shall willfully cause, or attempt to cause, insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty in the military or naval forces of the United States, or shall willfully obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States to the injury of the service of the United States, shall be punished by a fine,' etc.

"In connection with this section 1 of Title XII of the same act must be considered. This declares that 'every letter, newspaper, etc., in violation of any of the provisions of this act is hereby declared to be nonmailable, and shall not be offered in the mails or delivered from any post office nor by any carrier.' The light afforded by these sections of a valid and vital law shone upon the pages of the Jeffersonian when they were under the scrutiny of the members of the President's Cabinet. Congress had declared war. Thousands of the élite of the American Army were on the soil of France. At any moment the crash of their rifle fire and the thunders of their artillery in the vindication and defense of human liberty might be heard. American men-of-war manned by Americans were swiftly clearing the waters forbidden by the enemy to our commerce, questing every billow for his lurking and deadly craft. By the thousands the gallant youth of every American State were rallying to the flag. In the vast oversubscription of the liberty bonds our people had proven that in the common cause they will be as lavish of their treasure as of their blood. With the utmost nobility of soul, with the self-sacrificial spirit of woman, in the humane Red Cross and similar organizations, our country's daughters were no whit behind her sons.

"At this juncture of the Nation's life the Postmaster General and the Attorney General have discovered in the plaintiff's publication, which the Government through its mail was distributing to its people, such passages as this, taken from the issue of June 28:

"Men conscripted to go to Europe are virtually condemned to death and everybody knows it.
 "President Wilson admitted as much in his Flag Day address.
 * * * Why is your boy condemned to die in Europe?"

"Again, in the issue of July 19, is a statement aimed at the Chief Magistrate of the United States. That it is false, that it was intended to interfere with the operation or success of our forces, that it was an attempt to cause insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty by them the Postmaster General might well conclude.

"Does he, the President, not know that the conscription act, forcing citizens out of the Union to die in Belgium and France, is every bit as lawless as the action of the Phelps-Dodge Copper Co. in forcing these 1,100 miners out of Arizona? What are 1,100 miners to 685,000 conscripts whom our Caesar has condemned to death in 'foreign fields of blood'?"

"Nor is such reference as the following, to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States made in time of war deterrent to insubordination, disloyalty, mutiny, or refusal of duty:

"Are we, like the sow returning to her wallow and the dog to his vomit, to go back to the medievalism of personal rule—a Pope's word ruling the church and a King's word ruling the state?"

"Why not call Woodrow Wilson by the name of King or Kaiser or Czar if the Constitution is to be treated as the Kaiser treated the Belgian treaty?"

"The Kaiser did not swear to support the Belgian treaty. Woodrow Wilson did swear to support the Constitution.

"And now, within six months after taking that solemn and public oath, the Congressmen and President who did so, are treating the Constitution exactly as the Kaiser treated the Belgian treaty.

"Nor does Congress escape. On page 4 of the issue of July 19 is printed the vote of the House on the question to create a National Army. This under the title, 'These are the Representatives in Congress, lower House, who confiscated the liberty and lives of your sons.'

"A more direct but not more effective effort to obstruct the recruiting or enlistment service of the United States appears on page 7 of the issue of July 26, 1917:

"I advise (prints the editor of the Jeffersonian) the conscripts to await the decision of the United States Supreme Court and not to be clubbed by the fact of conscription into enlistment. Once you volunteer and sign up you can be sent anywhere, and the law can't help you.

"Equally but not more unmailable in contemplation of the act of Congress above quoted is the issue of August 16. In the affidavit before the court the Postmaster General, as we have seen, after charging the existence of an organized propaganda to discredit and handicap the Government in the prosecution of the war, declared that such matter is in violation of section 3 of Title I, and sections 1 and 2 of Title XII of the espionage act and is nonmailable. That for these reasons the publication is not a newspaper or other periodical publication within the meaning of the laws of the United States governing mailable matter of the second class, and the deponent so decided after due and thorough consideration of the matters and things stated herein." In this conclusion I find that he was fully justified.

"In such crises in Lacedæmon the Spartan mother, when her son went forth to battle, was accustomed to exclaim, 'Return on your shield or with it!' How dissimilar, how sordid is the cowardice 'The Jeffersonian' would encourage—

"What about a carload of German soap made out of our boys?"

"What about manuring German fields with our bravest youth and fattening German hogs on the choicest selection from American manhood?"

"I raised my boy to be a soldier," says the song, but did mother raise him to be pig feed?"

"Had the Postmaster General longer permitted the use of the great postal system, which he controls, for the dissemination of such poison it would have been to forego the opportunity to serve his country afforded by his lofty station.

"There is, moreover, an additional consideration of the weightiest character, which obliges the denial of such an injunction as is here sought. An appeal is made to an American court of equity to oblige the postal authorities of our country to contribute its mailing facilities for the furtherance and success of a propaganda against the Nation as distinct as it is truculent and dangerous. Under the familiar rule in equity, such an appeal is addressed largely to the discretion of the court. It is to be determined by the conscience of the chancellor, and always with proper regard to the public welfare. This imports the country's welfare. And a party seeking this extraordinary remedy under a rule equally familiar must come into court with clean hands. Can one be said to come with clean hands when the policy, methods, and efforts he would maintain may cause his hands to be imbrued in the blood of the demoralized and defeated armies of his countrymen? If by such propaganda American soldiers may be convinced that they are the victims of lawless and unconstitutional oppression, vain indeed will be the efforts to make their deeds rival the glowing traditions of their hero strain. On the contrary, the world will behold America's degradation and shame, the disintegration under fire of our line of battle, the inglorious flight of our defenders, like the recent debacle of the Russian Army, brought about by methods much the same, the ultimate conquest of our country, the destruction of its institutions, and the perishing of popular government on earth.

"The preliminary injunction is denied."

RECESS.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Wednesday, September 5, 1917) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, September 6, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, September 5, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, through whose constant care we live and breathe and dwell, aspiring high, "even to the throne of Thy Divinity," quicken our devotion to society, our homes, our country, and to Thee, that we may be ever on the side of right as it is given us to see the right.

We thank Thee for the splendid demonstration displayed in this great Capital City in behalf of the men who are going forth to battle against an insidious foe; may it be an inspiration to them in the great sacrifices, trials, and dangers through which they shall be called upon to pass.

Grant that we as a people may be united in our devotion to their needs. Direct them by Thy wisdom, protect them by Thy might, comfort them by Thy Fatherly love, and grant to them all the blessings which wait upon the faithful, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADDITIONAL BONDS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5901, and, pending that, I would like to ask unanimous consent that general debate be closed in an hour and a half, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] taking one hour and I to take one-half an hour.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not know just how many on this side wish to take part in general debate—

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if there is any disposition on the part of the committee to allow liberal debate under the five-minute rule at the point where amendments may be offered and discussed, I will not object to closing of the general debate, because I do not believe general debate does much good on a bill of this sort.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman that while the debate is sincere and for the purpose of perfecting the bill or amendments we have no disposition in the world to cut it off. We think the debate on the amendments ought to be full.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course there is not any disposition on anyone's part, so far as I know—

Mr. KITCHIN. And I do not think there will be.

Mr. MADDEN (continuing). To be insincere in any debate that might take place in this bill, but I do believe if amendments are offered there should be liberal opportunity to debate them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think so, too. There will be no disposition on our part to shut off debate.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I have no requests beyond an hour's time.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the gentleman from North Carolina permit a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. MEEKER. Is it the hope of the chairman to vote on this bill to-morrow?

Mr. KITCHIN. If we can get through to-day, we will vote to-day; but if we can not, we will vote to-morrow.

Mr. MEEKER. Will the insurance bill be taken up afterwards?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MEEKER. And we will vote on it this week?

Mr. KITCHIN. I hope we can vote on it this week, but I am very doubtful whether we can do it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to get a little time in which to discuss the matter of paying the newspapers for advertising the next bond issue.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think I can put forth the plan in five minutes. And I would like additional time when the amendment is presented.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman will have no difficulty in getting the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5901, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that debate on the bill be limited to an hour and a half, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to have an hour of that time and himself 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the House resolving itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5901, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, at the expiration of 10 minutes I would like to have the Chair call my attention to that fact, as I understand recess is to be called at that time for the reception to the Japanese commission. After that reception I expect to further proceed.

Gentlemen of the committee, the magnitude of this bill, together with the brevity of its consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means, will constitute my apology, if any be required or appropriate, for taking your time in general debate. There should be more than a brief explanation of the details of this bill. There are those who now would be satisfied with brief explanations. A people less patient hereafter may demand longer ones before payment of the debt we to-day impose. The House and the country should be given opportunity to consider the importance and far-reaching effect of this most important piece of legislation. This measure provides for loans aggregating $11,538,945,460, of which $4,000,000,000 in bonds is for loans to the allies; $3,538,945,460 in bonds and $4,000,000,000 in short-time Treasury certificates are for our own national war purposes.

I do not desire to oppose this bill. I expect to vote for it. I expect to support it for reasons that I shall give. These reasons are important to the country and to the world. We are dealing with billions. That is up among the numerically sublime. We remember how large the coppers of our savings bank appeared. We remember when the silver coins loomed larger, and afterwards the crisp bills of higher denominations seemed to grow with us. We finally began to deal in hundreds and later thousands. Millions were strange characters in the land of financial romance. We had not thought of billions, and few men, not permitted to be Members of this or another body, are given opportunities to deal with that far-off wide stretch of financial territory covered now by billions. Perhaps in the years to come men may talk of trillions. Some men estimate our national wealth as a one-fourth trillion now. Toward that goal this bill will hardly be called a boost.

We know how the Arab students of the stars wrote their distances in terms of numerical notation which we adapted. We know that the Arab contemplating the distance knew his fleetest courser could not carry him there. If he measured the miles in grains of sand, it became a vast desert upon which he was lost.

I remember, as will those who have studied astronomy, that we could measure and think of the distance between our seat of study and the horizon. We could think later, with our mathematical education, of the distance to some of the nearer planets, but when we began to think about the distance to the sun and to the stars we were lost; the distances were too great for us to comprehend. We were speaking in millions and billions. It was hard to train our minds and fix our thoughts upon those stupendous figures, and we could only understand them, not from thinking about them, but by in some way connecting them with some kindred effects.

We were taught that there were burning bodies sending light to this earth from beyond far-off Arcturus, trillions of miles, but we could not comprehend it. We obtained some little conception, however, when our professor told us that the light traveling from that distant sun had been running at the rate of 186,000 miles a second, and each beam had been on its way for years. Then we were told that perhaps the beams of light that we were receiving were coming from suns whose fires had long since burned out. It was a concrete glimpse of the finite mind into a phenomenon of the infinite.

So we as financiers, thinking about billions, can only understand something about them by measuring their effects. It is my purpose this afternoon to submit a few propositions and comparisons calculated to impress the minds of the members of the committee with the magnitude of this bill, and therefore the stupendous responsibility which this bill places upon one member of the Cabinet. Whatever I shall say of that member of the Cabinet shall be entirely impersonal. It would relate as well to any of his predecessors or any of his successors.

This bill provides for an indebtedness of $11,500,000,000; $7,500,000,000 in bonds, of which $4,000,000,000 is to be loaned to the allies, the balance for our own requirements. The remaining $4,000,000,000 is for short-time loans on Treasury certificates of indebtedness. That amounts to about 5 per cent of all the property, real, personal, and mixed, belonging to the citizens of this great Republic. But I will speak more particularly of the issuance of bonds—four billions of bonds to be loaned the allies.

Now, the issuance of bonds used to be a menace and a dread to the American people. But recent years of their recurring oft have softened our fear of them. We have been issuing them in recent years in times of peace as well as of war, so that we have become familiar with the issuance of bonds, and bond issues have had that familiarity which ordinarily breeds contempt. But now the sentiment is pity which precedes the embrace. You know in case of a disturbance in a neighborhood the offender is placed under bonds to keep the peace. We are placing our people under bonds to obtain the peace.

This bill provides in effect for taking of all American property $5 from every $100 from all of its citizens. That is the ordinary total net increase of wealth in recent years of the Republic, so we seize now for our use or conversion into foreign loans amounts equal to the total ordinary annual increase of our country's property. The total wealth of the United States at the beginning of its last great war is ordinarily estimated at $16,000,000,000. Approximately $11,000,000,000 of that belonged to the great commercial and industrial North, while $5,000,000,000 belonged to the chivalrous South; and yet to-day we are appropriating as much property or contracting indebtedness to a value or extent equal to all the property of all the Northern States at the outbreak of the Civil War. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. In compliance with the gentleman's request, the Chair announces that 10 minutes have been consumed.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5901) to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina withdraws the point.

RECEPTION OF JAPANESE MISSION.

The SPEAKER. The Chair announces the following committee to wait on the Japanese commissioners and conduct them into the Hall: Mr. FLOOD, Mr. LINTHICUM, Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas, Mr. STEDMAN, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. TEMPLE, and Mr. FOSS. Under the order of the House, the House will stand in recess 30 minutes.

Thereupon (at 12 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess.

At 12 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m. the members of the Japanese mission, escorted by the committee appointed by the Speaker, entered the Chamber and were announced to the House by the Doorkeeper. The members of the mission were: Viscount Ishii, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary; Vice Admiral Takeshita, Imperial Japanese Navy; Maj. Gen.

Sugano, Imperial Japanese Army; Mr. Masanao Hanihara, consul general at San Francisco; Mr. Matsuzo Nagai, secretary of the foreign office; Commander Ando, Imperial Japanese Navy; Lieut. Col. Tanikawa, Imperial Japanese Army; Mr. Tadanao Imai, vice consul; and Mr. Owaku.

Mr. Aimari Sato, ambassador from Japan to the Government of the United States; Mr. Tokichi Tanaka, counselor of the embassy; Capt. Nomura, naval attaché; and Lieut. Col. Mizumachi, military attaché, accompanied the mission into the House, together with Mr. Breckinridge Long, Third Assistant Secretary of State; Brig. Gen. James A. Irons, United States Army; Capt. C. C. March, United States Navy; and Mr. A. B. Ruddock, of the State Department, personally attached to Viscount Ishii.

Viscount Ishii was seated on the right of the Speaker and Ambassador Sato upon his left.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, Japan is one of the oldest countries in the world, and yet it is the very newest of the great powers of the world. [Applause.] The history of Japan extends back into the twilight of fable. In ancient times there were seven things selected that were denominated the wonders of the world. Nearly all of them have gone. The historian of the times in which we live will rank the remarkable and astounding progress of the Empire of Japan as one of the seven wonders of these times. [Applause.]

The Empire of Japan is our nearest western neighbor. She holds one side of the Pacific and we hold the other, and every right-thinking man in the Empire of Japan and in the Republic of the United States hopes that peace, amity, and friendly relations will always prevail between these two great powers. [Applause.]

Within the last few months we have had visiting commissions from France, Great Britain, Belgium, Russia, and Italy, and now we have the Japanese mission. I present to this magnificent audience Viscount Ishii, the head of the mission from Japan. [Applause.]

Viscount ISHII. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House of Representatives, I thank you most sincerely for this gracious reception. The rare opportunity thus afforded to me is deeply appreciated throughout the nation I have the honor to represent. [Applause.] I bring a message, borne by us across an ocean and a continent, from the Emperor and the people of our beloved island, set in the far eastern Pacific, to the President of the United States and to you, the representatives of the greatest Republic on earth to-day, a potent factor in the most stupendous and, we must believe, the final struggle for liberty throughout the world. [Applause.]

Our message reiterates an assurance of unchanged sincerity of friendship well understood by the people of the United States, but it is a message which has never found opportunity such as this for delivery. [Applause.] Your courteous permission for us to occupy a place on this historic rostrum and to speak within the hearing, in fact, of the hundred millions of people of the United States of America carries with it a forceful manifestation of the sentiment which we believe the United States entertain toward my country. [Applause.]

We would not have traveled 10,000 miles merely to repeat what must have sufficiently impressed itself upon you, but that within the last few months a new day has dawned [applause]—a day welcomed indeed by us. It follows upon another when you, with magnificent forbearance, endured great wrongs and outrages in the hope that recourse to the sword might be avoided. It was a day in which you bore the pitiless cruelty of the willful aggressor of all human rights—bore it bravely and with fortitude until the star of hope vanished and toleration ceased to be a virtue. Then, in the dawning of this day, you arose and threw your mighty forces into the balance against the wrong in favor of the right. [Applause.] In this dawning the Stars and Stripes flung across the skies were entwined with the emblem of the Rising Sun, and so commenced the brighter day. [Applause.] That is why we are here. We come to bring to you the message of our Emperor, which gives you assurance of the comradeship and the cooperation of Japan throughout this day. We are here to say that, with the other allies, we heartily welcome the advent of the United States in the fields of France and elsewhere. We recognize the great uplift given to humanity and the promise of a physical victory doubly insured by the most momentous decision you have taken. [Applause.]

We bring to you assurance of support, unselfish, without a motive other than the common force that drives us all to-day. [Applause.] We of Japan face the task seriously and with determination. We recognize the grim and unrelenting order we all must obey. We know that the desperate foe of civilization must be met by self-sacrifice, counsel, and unsleeping watchful-ness. We are here to say that Japan has done and will do what may be demanded of her to the utmost of her resources and to the best of her ability. [Applause.]

Yours are vast resources; ours may be small, but we can say to you that the spirit of Japan burns as ardently and will last as long as may be demanded in this war. [Applause.] We are eager for counsel with you. We come to find out how these two nations can best coordinate their energies and their resources; how best they can cooperate in the conduct and the winning of this war. [Applause.] We come to say to you that we are proud on this day to stand shoulder to shoulder with the soldiers of America. In the field and in the household; in the mine and in the shop, the men and the women of Japan are working and will work with a greater confidence and a higher sense of moral obligation.

Japan has exerted herself with the spirit of loyalty to her allies, her Emperor, and to her homes, following the ideals of our national life, to which I alluded when I had the honor of addressing your Senate a few days ago. Japan will continue to add her quota to the sacrifice which alone can insure a victory. [Applause.] Like the people of America, those of Japan have remained permanently independent because of a real patriotism which, when the occasion demands, never fails. We, like you, protect ourselves against aggression from without and treachery from within. We, like you, know nothing of tyranny and despotism; and we, like you, stand determined that malignance and oppression from the conqueror, imposed upon the conquered, shall not become the lot of our people. [Applause.] Neither shall our families and our homes be violated and desecrated by the licentious and brutal forces of evil now trampling upon the helpless women and children of the countries they have overrun. [Applause.]

Treachery from within, indeed, at this hour, calls for our attention. While your soldiers leave their families and their homes to fight on the blood-stained fields of France, we must guard our landmarks, as you will guard yours, against treachery that has found hiding places in our midst and which for the last 10 years has sown the seeds of discord between us. Let it be a part of our cooperation and coordination to protect each other from these forces of evil which lack even the poorest courage of an open enemy. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, we have been climbing a mountain toward the stars by different and sometimes devious pathways, but near the summit our roads shall join, and together we shall win into the full sunlight above the clouds. [Applause.] We shall pass safely through the dangerous places. Our blood shall not have been shed and our sacrifice shall not have been made in vain, for we shall be among the nations of a world living in a brotherhood of peace. [Applause.] Will it not then be a source of intense national pride to each of us to remember this day which must insure a permanent maintenance of these renewed pledges of comradeship and of cooperation?

I again wish to express my sincere appreciation of the honor you have done us. [Applause.]

The members of the mission then took their places on the right of the Speaker's rostrum, and the Members of the House of Representatives were presented to them.

The distinguished visitors were then escorted from the Hall of the House.

The recess having expired, the House (at 1 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) resumed its session.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a change of reference of the bill (H. R. 5913) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent to the McCloud River Club for 40 acres of land in the Sacramento land district, Cal., from the Committee on Patents to the Committee on the Public Lands. It really belongs to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. FERRIS. The bill is for the sale of 40 acres of public land.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

There was no objection.

ADDITIONAL BONDS.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 5901.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my brief speech before recess, followed by the Japanese commissioner's address and that followed by my remaining remarks, will give you a sort of parliamentary Japanese sandwich. When the recess was taken I was discussing the amounts found in this bill as compared with the value of the national property, with the North as one factor and the South as the other, at the beginning of the Civil War. At that time the total wealth of the 11 seceding States amounted to no more than $5,000,000,000; that covers the real estate, mixed property, and chattels, which last included the bondmen of that day. Yet that is only part of the amount which we propose to and have already loaned to the allies. The rights of property at that time were jealously guarded by the leading statesmen of the time and the giants of a decade before.

Webster, Clay, Calhoun, Hayne, and other contemporaries were reluctant to let even the Congress of the United States or the Supreme Court of the Nation, after due time for deliberation, determine the smallest part of these great subjects of controversy. Yet it all in dollars and cents amounted to less than that which we propose to place in the hands of an individual for his say as to where it shall go and who shall determine distribution of that vast sum.

We propose to loan $4,000,000,000 upon the judgment of one man with the approval, it is true, of the President. But the President has nothing to do with the preliminary stages of determining whether all of this sum may be withheld from all or any of the nations who may demand it. The President is only consulted before final disposition. That amount is nine times the total indebtedness of the 48 States of this Union. The total indebtedness of the 48 States of the Union is only $424,000,000. We propose in this bill to loan $500,000,000 more than all the debts of all the States and all the cities, counties, and minor municipalities of the Union combined, which amounted to $3,475,954,353.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman please repeat that statement. I did not catch it.

Mr. SLOAN. These $4,000,000,000 are $500,000,000 more than all the debts of all the States, of all the cities, of all the counties and all the municipalities of the United States. In 1913, just before the war, the combined United States national debt and those I have given before amounted to only $4,850,460,713. In other words, the total public indebtedness from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from the Gulf to the Lakes amounted to only $850,460,713, or 20 per cent, more than what we propose by our vote to hand over into the almost unrestricted charge of a single man. The following, taken from the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, may be of interest:

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Secretary, I want to know whether I am correct in my understanding of this bill, that it is regarded as necessary for the successful prosecution of the war that there be $4,000,000,000 of new bonds issued for loan to the other nations?

Secretary McADOO. Available for that purpose; yes.

Mr. SLOAN. There is $1,000,000,000 already provided for, which would make a total of $5,000,000,000. Now, then, as I understand it, whether one dollar of this be loaned or not depends absolutely on the initiative of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Secretary McADOO. No, sir; whether a dollar of this is loaned is dependent upon the application of the foreign powers for assistance.

Mr. SLOAN. Assuming it was all applied for, it is within the power, is it not, under the law—and I am not criticizing the Secretary, because we are making the law—that not a dollar could be loaned unless the Secretary of the Treasury said so. The President, as I understand, simply has the veto power or the approval power.

Secretary McADOO. I could not lend it without the President's express approval in each case.

Mr. SLOAN. But the initiative, so far as the law is concerned, is with you or with the Secretary, whoever he may be?

Secretary McADOO. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Then, although it might be regarded by the Congress as absolutely necessary to make these loans, yet the Secretary could refuse to lend a single dollar—I am now simply talking about your jurisdiction, and not what you would or would not do.

Secretary McADOO. He has the power, with the approval of the President to determine whether a loan within the limit imposed by Congress shall or shall not be made or whether it shall be made in part or in full.

Mr. SLOAN. I am now talking about the jurisdiction of the Secretary, and the point I want to emphasize is that although this Congress should authorize the $5,000,000,000—$4,000,000,000 now and $1,000,000,000 already authorized—and although it was deemed by the Congress as an absolutely necessary war measure, yet it depends upon the discretion of the Secretary, no matter how many applications are made, whether one dollar of the money shall enter into the processes of the war or not?

Secretary McADOO. Yes; as to whether it shall be lent or not and how it shall be apportioned among the powers is left with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Has the gentleman any information as to whether this will be the last necessity for a request of this kind for the fiscal year?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, we have just begun.

Mr. SLOAN. The indication, as far as that point is concerned, was given by the Secretary of the Treasury that it would be sufficient to run to the end of the fiscal year. It was made $4,000,000,000 on that account.

Mr. LITTLE. But I notice that the gentleman from Michigan said that this was just the beginning.

Mr. SLOAN. The gentleman from Michigan meant that this was the beginning of the expenditures for the great war. I think the gentleman from Michigan will agree that the information we had was that it would cover the loans to the allies up to July 1, 1918. The following is a statement of loans heretofore agreed upon and made:

Loans to foreign governments to Aug. 24, 1917, inclusive.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is correct.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Did the gentleman make his statement quite accurate when he spoke about the total indebtedness; he stated the total indebtedness at that time, but he meant the municipal and Government indebtedness?

Mr. SLOAN. I meant Government, State, city, county, and all the small districts of the United States.

Mr. DENISON. But the gentleman did not mean private indebtedness.

Mr. SLOAN. Oh, no; public indebtedness, of course. I am comparing the indebtedness of this country, the public debt, with that we are now creating. The total public indebtedness at that time was less than two-thirds of the total amount which we have loaned and which we have agreed to loan to the allies. The aggregate indebtedness of Nebraska (and I shall place the statement in the Record if I have permission, so that it may be used by all the Members)—State, county, city, and all minor municipal subdivisions, is $36,000,000. In other words, the public debt of the State of Nebraska and all its subdivisions is only nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the amount which this bill proposes to loan to the allies. The total debt of the State of Texas is $83,000,000, about 2 per cent of the amount which we propose in this bill to loan.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. I think a large portion of that debt is owing by the State to its school fund, which makes it owing to itself.

Mr. SLOAN. It is a State indebtedness—State, county, municipal, and all.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; but I only wanted to suggest that the school fund is invested in State bonds.

Mr. SLOAN. That is true; that is something we did in Nebraska a long time ago. The State of Texas is a forward and progressive State. It is taking good care of the children and is educating them. Permit me to predict one result of that education will be that within a generation the political complexion of the Texas delegation of this House will be radically changed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman will permit me to suggest that he is very hopeful.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I am hopeful, because good did come even out of Nazareth, and great good may come out of Texas.

The total public indebtedness of the Empire State, including all municipal subdivisions, was $1,046,000,000, only 26 per cent of the amount which we in this bill propose to loan.

Minor civil divisions included in the second column above embrace villages, towns, townships, precincts, fire districts, irrigation districts, poor districts, school districts, etc.

SINKING FUND ASSETS OF STATES, 1915.—Arizona, $2,098,303; Arkansas, $47,859; California, $809,118; Colorado, $10,763; Delaware, $87,470; Georgia, $100,000; Idaho, $939,057; Indiana, $207; Kansas, $78,639; Kentucky, $55,176; Maryland, $5,966,305; Massachusetts, $38,263,061; Montana, $150,601; New Hampshire, $90,000; New Mexico, $1,577,248; New York, $34,487,679; North Dakota, $30,334; Ohio, $111,510; Oklahoma, $190; Pennsylvania, $811,733; Rhode Island, $844,954; South Carolina, $469,704; Utah, $370,000; Virginia, $637,588.

This $4,000,000,000 is nearly equal to one-half the gold in the whole world. The total gold in the world is $8,258,000,000. The loan authorized by this bill, and already authorized and made by other legislation, will be equal to 84 per cent of all the gold in the world. The amount of the proposed loan in this measure reduced to gold would load 312 freight cars, each with 40,000 pounds. It would make 12 trains of 26 cars in each train and all stretched on a track would extend 2½ miles.

The total money of all forms in the United States on November 1, 1916, was $4,241,000,000, just 6 per cent more than the amount of this loan which we propose to make, and that includes, of course, the new reserve money and all other forms of money current in this country. In the fiscal year of 1916 the United States had the greatest foreign commerce, both export and import, in all its history. Its exports amounted to $2,187,883,510. Its imports amounted to $4,333,658,865. Collectively they amounted to $6,531,542,375, or $468,457,625 less than what we have already and propose to loan the allies.

The total assets in all the 12 reserve banks of the United States, according to the last statement, was $2,058,000,000, just a little more than one-half of this loan we propose to make. Think of the various safeguards in the way of boards, governors, directors, cashiers, and other means of supervision with which those $2,000,000,000 are hedged about. They are not left to the control of any one individual or any one set of individuals. When these foreign bonds are placed in the Treasury of the United States, compared with the gold that is free there or any other form of United States property, it will make all of that property appear as the merest chicken feed. All the wealth of Spain is only $5,400,000,000. The wealth of the Netherlands is only $5,000,000,000. Switzerland, that little neutral, buffeted by the belligerents on all sides, but which has withstood the blandishments and the threats of all, has a total wealth of only $4,000,000,000, the precise sum which we are now offering to loan in this bill.

With this as an American principle, at least for the time, and this our first effective contribution to the great war, we are certainly doing our part with full and rounded measure. I might say, if I did not dislike the term, we are doing our "bit." It is perhaps one of the most mouth-puckering lackadaisical terms ever given currency in the grim time of war. The man who said we are doing our "best" improved upon it; and he who said we are doing our "damnedest," gave us a better war word.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I am wondering if the gentleman happens to have learned in his capacity as a member of the committee or in his investigations how the British Government has made the loans to her allies in this war—through what agencies—whether she intrusts the matter to one man or whether she has other arrangements through which she makes the loan?

Mr. SLOAN. There has been little information upon that subject in the hearings. However, I understand that it is controlled by a war board of five members, all of whom are members of Parliament, namely, Prime Minister Lloyd-George, leader of House of Lords; Lord Curzon, chancellor of exchequer and leader of the Commons; Bonar Law, Viscount Milner, and Arthur Henderson.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. DILLON. Has the gentleman any information as to whether the British Government has made any loans to her allies since we made the first loan to her?

Mr. SLOAN. I do not know. The understanding was that we became the great loan broker of the world when we entered the war. We had the means, as they did not. We have been making the loans. I can not tell to what extent England has made loans since that time. I understand that she set aside two billions to loan her allies this year. The fact is that these questions indicate most strongly to me that we should have had more time, more deliberation, and more information upon this measure—not in an antagonistic way, not in the way of opposition, but that we might know what is going on, that we might know now and put ourselves in the way of knowing hereafter whether there is being shifted or may be shifted upon us any undue burden of this war.

Mr. DILLON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SLOAN. Certainly.

Mr. DILLON. The gentleman recognizes the fact that England loaned to her allies at a higher rate of interest than we are charging her. That is true, is it not?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; I presume England did what we are doing. England loaned at about what she had to borrow for. I would not charge her with doing less, but, of course, we have a credit, I will say to the gentleman, in this country unmatched by any country in the world in all time, and that rich factor, with all its force in field, on the sea, in the markets, and on the world's exchanges, is America's first great contribution to this great war.

Mr. DILLON. If she should reloan portions of the money that we are loaning her, she would be making vast profits upon her loan.

Mr. SLOAN. That, of course, would be a matter of mathematics.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I shall yield sufficient time. I desire to say, for the benefit of the gentleman's question, that my understanding is—and I think the information is about correct—that the loans we are making to the various countries are loans for the payment of their debts or for supplies purchased in this country. Somewhere around 80 to 90 per cent of the money that we are loaning to the allies is being spent in this country. I have understood that England is doing likewise to many of her allies for supplies purchased in England.

Mr. SLOAN. Our information is that it is not paying the debts previously contracted and for which the borrowers had issued their obligations, but paying on the contracts for supplies needed by the borrowers to keep their armies in the field and their navies afloat.

Mr. FORDNEY. The purchase of supplies in this country and in England.

Mr. SLOAN. Yes; to carry out the contracts for the purchase of supplies here in America which we have and they have not. I am not making these statements for the purpose of indicating that the American public is being in any way imposed upon in loaning this money; although a vigilant oversight by an able nonpartisan committee might do the American Government a great service in checking or preventing impositions for which these great loans furnish great opportunity. The one great excuse which can be given the American people for the financial burdens we are placing upon ourselves and posterity is that it may enable other armies to fight and save a deluge of our own sons' blood. A large amount of this money—10 or 20 per cent—was drawn to furnish credit or to pay indebtedness elsewhere, but the vast bulk of it—from 80 to 90 per cent—has gone into the purchase of supplies in America that we have and which American labor is producing.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLOAN. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. When the gentleman was making his comparisons, a question arose amongst some of us here in respect to them. Are not these comparisons based upon the eleven billions and a half as provided for in this bill and not upon the nineteen billions as a total sum?

Mr. SLOAN. Of course, they are based upon this bill. I am trying to address myself to the bill itself and the problems arising under the bill, so that the eleven billions or the eleven and a half billions—to be more accurate—total amount carried in this bill. I have not attempted to take up the various expenditures outside of this that have been made or that may be made between this time and the 1st of July, 1918.

I expect during the progress of the debate under the five-minute rule to propose at least two amendments governing the discretion of the Secretary in the issuance of these bonds:

First. These bonds should not in any event be issued for more than 30 years. That is the span of a generation. This generation should not burden the next generation, which was not consulted to pay the expenses of this war.

Second. The convertibility feature of the bonds should be stricken out. For the bonds which have been issued convertibility must be allowed, as that was the contract under the law of April 24, 1917. If the new bonds are issued at 4 per cent, that will mean in the course of 30 years to taxpayers an additional sum of $300,000,000. If the war goes on and we sell a new issue of bonds at 4½ per cent next year, it will mean an additional interest charge of $1,050,000,000. You can rest assured that the holders of low-rate bonds, with an opportunity to convert their holdings into higher-rate bonds, will see to it just as they are now depressing the market of the liberty bonds, so that the new issue must apparently be issued at a higher rate. This convertible feature was copied by the Congress from the British system last April, after it had been adopted and abandoned by Britain. I have examined the history of the Treasury Department. It has been in existence 128 years, and during that time there have been 46 different Secretaries of the Treasury. The average term of a Secretary of the Treasury is 2½ years. Further, the bonds that have been issued heretofore under the act of April 24, 1917, were issued at a maximum 30-year period. If the average incumbency of that office is 2½ years it would leave during the life of those bonds 11 different individuals to administer the subject matter of this bill. So you will observe that what I am saying about the various amendments which I shall present is directed not against the individuals who occupied, occupy, or who may hereafter occupy this office, but toward whoever it may be.

Good men, they say, do not need much restraint, but we do not know who may occupy the position. The true legislative theory in the granting of power to administrative officers is to safeguard the public against the mistakes, follies, and misdoings of the weakest and worst incumbent who may have opportunity, rather than to merely direct the course of the most patriotic, virtuous, and wise.

Moreover, in the grant of power by Congress to an administrative officer, limitation of discretion on important features is a wholesome means of defense provided for the official against the importunities, blandishments, or coercion of those whose self-interest might prompt them to so influence a too-wide discretion. Now, if we were to endow the incumbent of the Treasury Department with all the foresight of Joseph, with all the fidelity of the faithful steward of whom the New Testament speaks, and with all the financial genius of Alexander Hamilton, yet that would be one man in a century. We could not expect the next eleven to be equally endowed. If there were any other reasons demanded to enforce the suggestion I have made, I know of no better than to call attention to the revenue bill introduced early in this session, hurried through the House committee, and given but fair consideration. Under the circumstances it was a pretty good bill. That bill went to the other body, and there the elder statesmen have been wrestling with it for four months. Yet we can not predict what amount it will carry. I believe it will be something near $2,500,000,000. Two billion five hundred million is only five-eighths of the amount we propose in this bill to loan and place in the control of one man. That revenue bill has received the careful consideration of the Committee on Ways and Means, the Committee of the Whole, and of this House. Further, the Finance Committee of the Senate and its Committee of the Whole has considered deeply and debated it vigorously. The papers of the United States and orators on the platforms, all have been busy commending, criticizing, threatening, and promising in order to see that no undue responsibility or burden is placed on anyone growing out of that tax measure.

It illustrates how careful we are in the matter of payment and with what facility and readiness we contract a debt. The comparatively small tax or payment bill has been debated at length by Congress. That bill and the debates will be forgotten soon, but the vigorous American debate on this bond bill will run for 50 years.

I have brought these matters before the committee to urge that in some manner responsibility be divided. Let us have some of the benefits of counsel. While we are the only country in any wise representative in character involved in this war, where strict partisans are in administrative control, and while no complaint at this time is being made by me as to that fact, yet the people of the country would be better assured if a committee representing the country at large were in a position to scrutinize and criticize, if need be, the transactions where billions of the people's money are being dispensed, and especially when the manner of dispensing may mean peace or war.

We are peculiarly obligated to vote large sums of money. In the first place, it is our first method of warfare and means of making ourselves felt. I take it as significant that every member of the Committee on Ways and Means will vote for this measure. Few Members of this House, if any, will vote against this bill. It will be a concrete method of expressing the unified will and purpose of the American people to attain in this great war a great victory or an honorable peace. This act will be a wholesome example to all our people, an inspiration to our armies and to those who fight with us, while to our enemies it will mean an irresistible force against which their cruelty and wrath can not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SLOAN. May I have a few minutes more?

Mr. FORDNEY. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. SLOAN. How much time will the gentleman's generosity permit him to yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not believe I have any other requests, and I will yield the gentleman 5 minutes or 10 minutes if necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SLOAN. But aside from this we are under a special obligation to vote large sums, as we have already voted large armies. For the first time perhaps in the history of the world a declaration of war such as we made was voted by a legislative body. This is the fourth declaration of war made by America, but none of them contained anything like the pledge in this declaration. Moreover, I have read the declarations of war made by the members of the entente and the central powers. I find we stand alone in this great war and in all modern times. So far as my reading is concerned this is the first time that a Congress or a body capable of pledging all the resources of a nation pledged them all for the successful issue of a great war. That having been done, we must live up to it or stand in the position of repudiating the pledge made by a large majority of Congress. I call your attention to the declaration of war made on the 5th of April, 1917. I omit the first and purely formal parts:

Resolved, That the state of war between the United States and the Imperial German Government which has thus been thrust upon the United States is hereby formally declared, and that the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on war against the Imperial German Government, and to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

As I said, three times the American people before this declared war. In the declaration of 1812, that portion relating to the pledge, says:

And that the President of the United States is hereby authorized to use the whole land and naval forces of the United States to carry the same into effect and issue to private armed vessels of the United States commissions or letters of marque and general reprisal in such form as he shall think proper and under the seal of the United States against the vessels, goods, and effects of the Government of the said United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and subjects thereof.

In the war with Mexico the pledge was:

The President be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ the militia, naval and military forces of the United States, and to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not exceeding 50,000, who may offer their services, either as cavalry, artillery, infantry, or riflemen, serve 12 months after they shall arrive at the place of rendezvous, or to the end of the war, unless sooner discharged, according to the time for which they shall have been mustered into the service; and that the sum of $10,000,000, out of any money in the Treasury or to come into the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, to be and the same is hereby appropriated for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into effect.

The declaration of war with Spain had this provision:

That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States and to call into actual service of the United States the militia of the several States to such extent as may be necessary to carry this act into effect.

It will be noted the limited pledge made in each of these declarations, but in the declaration against Germany it involved interest and principal, profits and capital, property—real, personal, and mixed—of men, corporations, and institutions.

That business should struggle to delay its peculiar sacrifice is but natural. So will drafted men plead for their temporary exemption, each knowing that all are pledged, and it is simply a question of when to be called and used. Credit and property, money and men, all are pledged by the Congress in the declaration. We now are simply carrying out for use a portion. In other wars we jeopardized all, life and property, but did not pledge it.

Further, these were all to be used as outlined in the presidential speech in financing nations great and small, solvent and insolvent, stable and unstable, furnishing arms for the battle fields of Europe and the rebuilding and recasting its industries. In other words, Congress placed this country under the burdens of a world war with the apparent enthusiastic consent of most nations involved that we shall bear these burdens.

With that broad appropriation of practically every dollar's worth of property in the United States, with the command gone out to every man who can bear arms, if need be, with the appropriations that we are making and these authorizations of indebtedness and loan that we have made, and with this expanding spiral-like legislation which we have, and the placing of this power in the hands of an individual, it seems to me these should address to every legislator on either side of this Chamber the solemnity and awfulness of the responsibility so placed.

And without any partisanship suggested or any factious criticism I submit that first after we meet the reasonable demands—yes, the large demands—necessary for the prosecution of this war Congress should safeguard every expenditure of men and money, so that criticism hereafter may be averted as far as possible, and so that all of us may to such extent as we can say, when the war is closed, "We protected the lives of the men; we safeguarded the money of the taxpayers." For that reason, it seems to me, that the majority, in view of these large responsibilities, should take the initiative to divide and distribute these large responsibilities. I shall await a brief time longer the organization of such committee before urging more specific reasons.

I know it has been said that the Executive of this Government is opposed to such committee. Whether he is or not I do not know. I shall not believe that, having recommended to Congress the pledging of every man of the Republic and every dollar of its property for the carrying on of this war, he would oppose a fair distribution of the responsibility among the citizens of the Republic, that no waste of money, no extra hazard of men, should be made. And I refuse to believe it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. SLOAN. I shall refuse to believe it until the President of the United States in the constitutional way, by a message to this Congress, and through it to the American people, says that he is opposed to a fair distribution of these responsibilities. Personally I voted against the declaration of war, which was carried. From entering Congress I had supported every reasonable measure of preparedness presented. I had stood for strengthening our Army and Navy when many of our now most vociferously militant citizens were insisting upon all steel going into plowshares and pruning hooks. Having always stood for protection of American life and property when under the American flag, having a profound confidence in American ability to protect and enforce those rights, and thinking of America first, I submitted an amendment to the war declaration. It was voted upon in the Committee of the Whole. It provided for placing our Nation in a thorough state of defense, and use of our Army and Navy to enforce our rights on land and sea, and especially in the submarine zone. This, to my mind, would have been an American war, with American troops, to be outlined by American statesmanship, and fought within the scope that America determined to be settled between America and her adversary, without the suggestion or consent of any other nation. But by a large majority of House and Senate the American people spoke in favor of this great world war movement, of which we became the substantial basis.

As a good citizen and consistent legislator, having expressed myself upon that subject, when overruled by an overwhelming majority of the membership of this House I submit to it as a settled fact. Americans should think of battle as the focal fact of this great war and not dwell on the academic question of its causes. We are in the struggle with victory to achieve and an honorable peace to obtain. To me there is no hesitation of purpose or halting of action.

My own position in that regard, finding my country under the declaration of war and beginning to bear its largest burdens, makes me feel like the young man in the story. It is somewhat old, perhaps, in political history, but I will tell it.

John was attending the university. He was expected to come to his uncle's home during the haying season in order to help on the farm. He did come home, but the bed was so comfortable and the viands so good and the society so enjoyable that he said he would not pitch hay. But John changed his mind a few days after that. The neighbors, having heard talk about his insubordination, were surprised, in coming along past a siding place in the highway, to find wagon and hayrack overturned, a load of hay lying on its side, and John, with a pitchfork, pitching to beat the band. They said to him, "We thought you weren't going to pitch any hay." He replied, "I did not expect to do so, but I have got to. Uncle is under this load, and I have got to pitch him out."

And so Uncle Sam is under the load of this great war, and whether we were for it or were against it, we must pitch him out. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] such time as he may desire.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, six years ago, or even six months ago, if we had been told that the representatives of the people would vote eleven thousand million dollars out of their pockets almost without debate and with the minimum of consideration all of us would have said that the suggestion was preposterous. But we are doing that very thing to-day and all of us will support the measure. It is commanded by an exigency that all here understand, and that I believe the country also understands.

The world is going bankrupt under the influence of an almost universal madness. While madmen are slaughtering each other and imperiling civilization unparalleled, and to some degree unavoidable, burdens are being put on the man who labors, not merely on those of the present generation but on those yet unborn, who will be called on to pay the debts we are making to-day. In no period of the world's history has the future ever been so heavily mortgaged and the end is not in sight. Personally I believe that men now living, the men who are responsible for the war, ought to pay for it. It would make them realize what it means and might have a deterrent influence in the future. It would, sir, be a wholesome thing if each generation could be made to understand that it must pay for its own wars, for then there would be fewer wars to be paid for.

The necessity for doing this thing is just one of the evil consequences of war. The horrors that have so shocked the sensitive soul of Pope Benedict and driven him to make an appeal for peace are wonderfully appealing. They are dramatic and easily understood, but the money burdens, no matter how hard to bear, are not so clearly seen. For a hundred years the unfortunate people of Europe will feel the pressure of taxation that hinders the development of projects for their social betterment.

But the personal peril and the tax burdens are not the only and by no means the most important of the evil consequences of war. Hysteria is never conducive to reasoning, and when to it is added the roll of the drum and the rattle of musketry the most valued rights and privileges of the people are in danger. It is then that the liberties of the people are in real peril. It is in precisely such circumstances that prudent and farseeing men are most concerned for the constitutional rights of the people, but, unfortunately, it is also precisely the time in which they have the least support from the mass of the people whose liberties they are trying to protect.

We are all sworn to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, every article and every paragraph in it, and great lawyers and real patriots are discussing it and its applicability to the present situation, to the war legislation already enacted as well as to that under consideration. It is our duty, being solemnly sworn to uphold and defend it, to heed these discussions and to inform ourselves as much as possible about the Constitution.

The monthly magazines and the weekly and daily newspapers have published many essays about the constitutionality of the act of May 18, 1917, commonly known as the conscription or draft act. Some of these have shown evidence of great research and thought and are valuable contributions to our polemical literature. One of these is a letter to the Mobile Register written by Hannis Taylor, a distinguished international and constitutional lawyer and former minister to Spain under President Cleveland. Under the leave granted me I shall print it as a part of my speech.

The letter is as follows:

NATIONAL MILITIA CAN NOT BE SENT ABROAD—CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MR. HANNIS TAYLOR AND THE MOBILE REGISTER AS TO JUDGE SPEER'S RECENT DECISION IN FAVOR OF THE VALIDITY OF THE CONSCRIPTION ACT OF MAY 18, 1917.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MOBILE REGISTER:

It was kind and public-spirited of you to send me over your own signature your recent editorial entitled "Speer's Clear Decision," in order that I may remove from the minds of many good people some grave misapprehensions as to this all-important subject. Judge Speer's conclusion that the act in question is constitutional is perfectly sound; I so stated in a formal opinion published some weeks ahead of Judge Speer's. That was the only question before him. Whether the conscripted members of the national militia are entitled under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, to exemption from service abroad is a question that can not arise until an actual attempt is made to send them out of the country. If such an attempt is ever made—which I gravely doubt—every intelligent and upright Federal judge will, when applied to, sustain such exemption; first, because the question was settled once and forever in favor of the exemption by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States rendered 90 years ago; second, because the whole subject was reviewed exhaustively and the exemption sustained in a formal official opinion given by Attorney General Wickersham to President Taft on February 17, 1912; third, because, with that opinion before him, the exemption was restated and reaffirmed by President Wilson, regretfully, in four speeches delivered in January and February, 1916, at New York, Cleveland, Milwaukee, and Topeka. In his Topeka speech he said that "the National authority has no right to call upon them (the National Guard) for any service outside of their States unless the territory of the Nation is actually invaded." In his New York speech he said, "Only upon occasion of actual invasion has the President of the United States the right to ask those men to leave their respective States."

When the midsummer madness under which we are now suffering has been cooled by the snows of winter, the Supreme Court of the United States will first affirm itself; then it will affirm Attorney General Wickersham; then it will affirm President Wilson in the common assertion that our entire militia, State and Federal, is exempt from service outside of the territorial limits of the United States. It will affirm the concise and graphic conclusion of Attorney General Wickersham that the militia can never "be employed for purposes of offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States." There can be no possible confusion as to the composition of the militia, because it is thus defined in the national defense act of June 3, 1916:

"Composition of the militia: The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age, and said militia shall be divided into three classes—the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia."

The conscription act of May 18, 1917, is simply a supplement of the act of June 3, 1916, passed with the avowed purpose of organizing the unorganized militia of the United States. The conscripts about to be put into camps for the purpose of transportation abroad are now simply a part of the "unorganized militia" of the United States.

The Congress has enacted but two conscription laws in our entire history. The first was the act of March 3, 1863, which declares in its preamble that it was passed under section 8, Article I of the Constitution, which provides that "the Congress shall have power . . . to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." The Supreme Court has held in Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19, 27) that the militia can be used for no other purposes. For that reason it can not be taken abroad, because invasions can only be repelled within the territorial limits of the United States. The second conscription act, of May 18, 1917, is a substantial reproduction in every material particular of the first act of March 3, 1863, and was passed, of course, under the same clause of the Constitution, for the conclusive reason that it could not have been passed under any other, as section 8 of Article I is the only part of the Constitution under which Congress can "call forth" the militia at all.

Some foolish people, who know nothing of the Constitution or of the history of the convention of 1787 that made it, are silly enough to contend that the conscription act of May 18, 1917—passed to organize the "unorganized militia"—was enacted under that clause of the Constitution which provides that "The Congress shall have power . . . to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Every school-boy should know that that clause relates exclusively to the power of Congress to provide a Regular Army by the volunteer system—it has nothing whatever to do with the militia system. Every act of Congress passed since the foundation of the Government for the raising of the Regular Army of volunteers has been based on that clause. Every professional soldier who has written on our military system recognizes that fact as basic and elementary. In the words of Gen. Upton, Military Policy of the United States, page 81, "The 'levies' known later as 'volunteers' were authorized under the plenary power of Congress to 'raise and support armies,' and the power of appointing their officers was given the President, to whom it obviously belonged, as the 'levies' were wholly distinct from the militia or State troops." See, to the same effect, Huidekoper, The Military Unpreparedness of the United States; Gen. Leonard Wood, Our Military History.

My dear Mr. Editor, as you naturally object to the "legal mesh" in which you say lawyers are entangling this subject, why not abandon them entirely for the military experts quoted above, who will remove all your difficulties. The last word comes from Gen. Leonard Wood, who says, in Our Military History, published last year, that "Our policy is not one of aggression, but one which looks only to a secure defense." He, in common with all professional soldiers, laments the fact that the makers of our matchless Constitution so hobbled our military system that only the Regular Army, composed of volunteers, can ever be sent abroad. He says with great emphasis that we have been compelled to fight our foreign wars with volunteers "because the militia was not available for service outside of the United States." He then adds that we had so to conduct the Mexican War, "where the militia could not be used because of the constitutional limitation upon its employment outside of the United States." As a reasonable man, do you think that if the National Militia could not be sent to Mexico with Gen. Scott that it can now be sent to France with Gen. Pershing? If you think the Federal convention of 1787 made a mistake in protecting us in this way then you must gibbet Washington, Madison, Mason, Franklin, Pierce, Butler, Ellsworth, and the rest, because, as the records show, they did this thing deliberately and with malice aforethought to keep us forever out of the broils of Europe. As this grave matter is all so plain, please explain it through your columns to the thousands of anxious hearts now suffering from cruel and unnecessary anxiety.

HANNIS TAYLOR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 29, 1917.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in five minutes all that I can hope to do is to call the attention of the membership of the House to the fact that through some mishap or other it has been published all over the United States that the newspapers, especially the small newspapers, are to be paid a little money as partial recompense for the great work that they will do in promoting this next bond sale. I presume that many of the Members have received letters on the subject, especially Members having country editors in their districts.

Now, if the Members will run over the hearings and read the statements of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, which should be read by every Member, they will find that he tries to be very fair in the matter, but that he explains that it will be very difficult to pay for advertising, or to agree to pay for advertising, because if he starts to pay one he will have to go clear down the line. It is apparent that the United States can not go into one county and say that one newspaper is a good advertising medium and that another is a bad one. The Government can not pay one and then with good grace ask that paper's rival to do advertising and bond-sale boosting for nothing.

Mr. Chairman, in the hearings considerable time was given to a discussion of the fact that bankers, investment brokers, and others spent very largely of their own money in negotiating the last loan, and that they should be reimbursed for certain cash expenditures, or at least they should not be asked to go through the whole thing again without being paid the second time for actual outlay. The total statement in regard to the cost of negotiating the last loan is not yet quite made up. The distinguished Secretary says he will send the figures to Congress in a short time.

I am not quite clear about it, from running through this testimony hastily, but I think it is still being debated in the Treasury Department as to whether certain men who are out of money, out of pocket, shall be reimbursed or not. I presume they will not be reimbursed. We all know that thousands of citizens did their part in promoting that loan. Department stores advertised it, banks advertised it, and newspapers advertised it, and I think none of them is claiming the right to be reimbursed. But the newspapers should not be asked to do free of charge the second time what it is not desired to ask brokers to do without paying them.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Could the gentleman state why the Government should not pick out a paper in each county having good advertising facilities, and explain why that should not be done? Would it interfere with the loan?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; it will help the loan. But imagine the Government attempting to go into a county and saying that the leading Democratic paper is a good advertising medium and that its Republican rival is not, or let the Government favor a newspaper of the other politics, or overlook a Socialist paper in some outlying district. One can see what an unfortunate result might follow.

To my mind the Government should not attempt to pay in full for what the newspaper advertising would cost. Any sum that can be paid will be but an earnest on the part of the Government that it does not want the newspapers—especially the little papers, where typesetting is hard and the struggle heavy—to do all the boosting for nothing. Congress should put a proviso into this bill stipulating that a certain sum should be spent for newspaper and magazine advertising, and I do not believe it would be a bad idea at all to particularize that the sum shall be divided among the States in proportion to the population. You understand that this bill contemplates that the Treasury shall go into every hamlet, placing stamp books on sale in the smallest post offices, so that a man can invest as low as 50 cents. All of that you will find fully explained in the Secretary's testimony before the committee. People will contribute to this loan through what are called war-savings certificates in sums as low as 50 cents and even smaller. To be successful that idea must be followed up.

Not every community has good public speakers, not every family in every community can be reached by the great daily papers, and if we are going clear down to the last household to ask for a patriotic contribution of 50 cents and of other small sums again and again, until they can climb up into a $5 interest in a Government war bond, we certainly ought, right alongside of that, to guarantee a little $2 bill to a small struggling weekly newspaper, whose columns will promote the plan from start to finish, whether you pay him little or much. The editor of the small paper will do it anyway, of course; but can you blame him for feeling a little sore when people all around are getting war profits and he gets not even a crumb?

Mr. HARDY. Was it ever suggested that the very stamps themselves might be made an advertising medium by printing a new style of stamp?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That would be a good idea, and might be done.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in the last war-bond sale great sums had to be spent to print illuminated posters and put them up. The magazines and newspapers gave their space, but the posters were paid for, on the ground that labor costs money and ink costs money. But it costs the editor money to pay for printers and paper. His space is all he has to sell. He can not give it all away.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like a little more time.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much more time have I to my credit?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I thank the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I merely wish to say in connection with the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], as to advertising this loan on the postage stamps, that Canada resorted to that method so far as the canceling stamps are concerned, and I believe with very good results.

Mr. ROSE. I should like to know if the newspapers have been complaining as to not receiving pay?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; not at all; and I take it that no citizen of the United States complains as to not being reimbursed for his efforts in promoting the last bond sale. In fact, I hesitated a little about asking time to put forward the suggestion that publishers should be paid in part.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are voting a great bond issue without restrictions. The true statement of this tremendous issue was made in the hearings by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] in about seven lines, and I hope no Member of Congress will deceive himself into thinking that he is not playing a part in making this great bond issue and in authorizing further loans to the allies. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], replying to a suggestion made by a Member on the Republican side in the hearings, said:

I should like to say that you [the Secretary of the Treasury] are here asking 435 Members of the House of Representatives and ninety-odd Members of the Senate whether it is advisable for this Government to lend foreign Governments $4,000,000,000 more money. They are the gentlemen who are to pass on the advisability of loaning that amount. You never pass on that. Congress passes on that—a pretty good body of men.

Gentlemen, when Mr. GARNER said "You never pass on that," he was addressing the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary does not. He recommends it, in keeping with the policy already adopted; but, as a matter of fact, we are the ones who pass on this whole loan and give the authority to loan money abroad. And if we put a statement in the bill that the newspapers shall be paid, say, $1,500,000, that is a small part of nine billions.

As to the amount which can be used for expenses, the entire amount on a complete turnover of this bond issue will be $23,000,000, according to the hearings. I believe the last public-building bill that passed this House called for less than that, yet we discussed it here for a solid week. It is proposed to authorize the expenditure of $23,000,000 for the expenses in connection with this war loan, and when we reach that item I presume that some one will rise and move that that amount be cut down and will point out that it is too large. If we are going to appropriate that sum, or any considerable part of it, as a percentage for the turnover of these bonds, we will make a mistake if we do not specify outright that at least a million and a half of dollars of it shall be paid for advertising in daily and weekly newspapers.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Gladly.

Mr. FORDNEY. Twenty-three million dollars was the amount asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury, which was one-fifth of 1 per cent on the long-time bonds and one-tenth of 1 per cent on the short-time bonds, but that amount has been reduced by the committee and is specified as one-seventh of 1 per cent for the long-time bonds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I misread that. I read only the Secretary's statement. That would cut the total for expenditures down to what amount?

Mr. KITCHIN. Seventeen million six hundred and twenty-seven thousand dollars.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, even that is a very considerable amount of money, and in my short experience in Congress I have seen Members debate for days at a time propositions which carried a less expenditure. The point I am making is that we should not let this bill go through without guaranteeing by the provisions of section 10 that a million and a half of dollars, at least, shall be expended for advertising in daily and weekly newspapers. Surely we have the right to partially designate the expenditure of that much out of so large a sum. I am insistent upon it, for I am told that from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury the statement was made, after this bill had been reported, that no money would be available for advertising.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not think there is any other gentleman on this side who desires to speak in general debate. I will ask if there is anyone else on that side?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have no one on this side who desires to speak.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then I ask that the bill be read under the five-minute rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States for the purposes of this act, and to meet expenditures authorized for the national security and defense and other public purposes authorized by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $7,538,945,460, and to issue therefor bonds of the United States, in addition to the $2,000,000,000 bonds already issued or offered for subscription under authority of the act approved April 24, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize an issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend credit to foreign Governments, and for other purposes."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the reading of the section has not yet been completed, and I would like to inquire whether it is in order to offer amendments at this time, or at the conclusion of the reading of the section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the whole section should first be read.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the rules of the House revenue and appropriation bills are considered by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is immaterial, so long as we arrive at an understanding as to which shall be done.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not care particularly.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we can get along a little faster if we have unanimous consent to read a section, and then offer amendments at the end of each section as read.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the understanding of the Chair that all bills except appropriation bills are read by sections.

Mr. KITCHIN. All except revenue and appropriation bills.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a revenue bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. Very well; let it be read by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the understanding is that amendments will be offered at the conclusion of the paragraphs. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, after the word "States," in line 2, strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, That of this sum $3,063,945,460 shall be in lieu of that amount of the bonds authorized by sections 1 and 4 of the act approved April 24, 1917, $225,000,000 shall be in lieu of that amount of the bonds authorized by section 39 of the act approved August 5, 1909, $150,000,000 shall be in lieu of the bonds authorized by the joint resolution approved March 4, 1917, and $100,000,000 shall be in lieu of the bonds authorized by section 400 of the act approved March 3, 1917."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, this does not introduce anything new nor make any change in the bill; it simply makes clear and specific a fact that appears elsewhere in the bill, that these appropriations here are made in the place of appropriations which were made in previous laws. It is provided in section 11 of the bill that these are substitutes, but for anyone not familiar with the subject to discover that fact they would have to look up with some difficulty the sections referred to. Therefore I think this amendment would clarify and improve the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice from the reading of the amendment that it strikes out all of the paragraph after the word "States," in line 2.

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether it makes any provision in the amendment so as to make clear that the authorization of the seven billion five hundred and thirty-eight million is in addition to the $2,000,000,000 already issued?

Mr. GILLETT. That appears perfectly clear. This is offered in place of the other, and that would still appear.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not appear in the amendment that it is in addition to the $2,000,000,000 of the bonds already issued.

Mr. GILLETT. It does not explicitly so state; but that is the fact, and the statement would be superfluous.

Mr. STAFFORD. I should think that there ought to be no doubt in the phraseology of the bill that this is in addition to the $2,000,000,000 heretofore authorized and heretofore subscribed for. You are striking out the language which makes clear this authorization.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts makes that perfectly clear when read in connection with section 11.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not considering it in connection with section 11, but only as to the matter stricken out.

Mr. GILLETT. I want to say that I submitted this amendment to the committee.

Mr. KITCHIN. I have examined the amendment, and so have other members of the Ways and Means Committee, very carefully, and compared it with the act and the amounts stated in the amendment, and I find that they are correct. I think it is a wise suggestion and the committee has no objection to accepting the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, which I offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GILLETT: Page 1, line 4, after the word "President," insert "and a committee of the Congress, consisting of two Members of the Senate and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be elected by the respective bodies to which they belong."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that amendment.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is clearly germane. Congress has all power as to the issuing of bonds and can determine to whom and by whom the bonds shall be issued. We can do it ourselves; we need not allow the Secretary any power at all. The committee has in this bill left it to the Secretary of the Treasury, but Congress can certainly say we leave it to the Secretary of the Treasury subject to the approval of Congress, and that would clearly be germane because, as we have the whole power, we certainly can give him the whole power which we now have or we can give him part of the power. My proposition is that instead of giving the Secretary the whole power, as the bill now does, that it shall give him the power subject to the approval of a small committee of Congress. In other words, Congress yields a part of its power. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee has felt bound to make the point of order, because it seems to me very desirable that Congress should not give away all of its power in the issuing of such a stupendous sum as this. Congress could reserve a part of the power for itself; it should reserve at least approval for a committee of Congress. Therefore I can not see why it is not germane. It simply limits and diminishes the power which the bill as it now stands already gives, and instead of giving absolute power to the Secretary of the Treasury it gives him a part of the power.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as the Chair is doubtless aware, when the first bond bill was introduced I proposed a somewhat similar amendment, which would probably be more vulnerable to a point of order than the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. At that time, as the Chair is also aware, the ruling of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], who was then in the chair, was that the amendment was in order. I also recollect that he had no doubt about my amendment being in order. I think there are also some other holdings to the same effect. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts simply limits the provisions of the bill to a slight degree and it ought to be held in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, and therefore so rules.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 9, after the word "purposes" insert the following:

"Provided, That to cooperate with the President and the Secretary of the Treasury in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the loan and expenditure of money authorized for the national security and defense a joint committee shall be appointed, composed of six Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and three Republicans, and seven Members of the House of Representatives, including four Democrats and three Republicans, to be known as the Joint Committee on War Expenditures. The membership of such committee for the Senate shall be designated by the President of the Senate and for the House of Representatives by the Speaker thereof. Such committee shall sit during the sessions or the recesses of Congress, shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury on any or all matters relating to such expenditures, and shall make report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress. Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise and to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical expert and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard briefly upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the Chair and the ruling just made upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], I submit this is a different proposition and that it is germane to the bill, as it was held to be germane upon a substantially similar amendment presented to the original bond bill. It will be recalled that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] proposed the amendment to the first bond bill, which, in general terms, provided for the appointment of a joint committee upon the conduct of the war. The language of this amendment is slightly different from the language of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and it is more specific in its application to the bill. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole when the first bond bill was under consideration [Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee], ruled that the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] was not well taken. In that ruling he held unhesitatingly that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] was in order and germane. The amendment I have offered proposes not to interfere with the President in the conduct of the war, nor even to consult him on that point. It provides for a congressional cooperation with the President and with the Secretary of the Treasury on the question of expenditures within the limits of this bill and this particular section and in accordance with their terms. It proposes to cooperate both in the matter of the expenditures and loans authorized in this bill.

Apart from the ruling of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] when Chairman of the Committee of the Whole during the consideration of the first bond bill is the case which is entirely familiar to the present occupant of the chair, that of the discussion over the half-and-half plan with respect to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. Mr. Speaker CLARK was in the chair at the time, when the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, then the floor leader of the House, offered as an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill an amendment having in view substantially the purpose that my amendment has in view, namely, the creation of a joint committee of the Senate and House to deal with the expenditures made under the appropriation bill. There was much argument upon that question. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] who is well known and highly appreciated by all as a parliamentarian in this body, argued against the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama upon the ground that it was not germane, but the occupant of the chair, Mr. Speaker CLARK, in a ruling which the present Chairman will readily recall, held the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama to be germane and to be in order. The ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK upon that occasion, boiled down to its finest point, was as follows:

The question of whether or not it is new legislation would have applied originally, but it does not apply in this situation, and the Holman rule has nothing to do with the amendment. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] contains a proposition which is germane—

The same kind of a proposition that is before the committee now—and, therefore, the point of order raised by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] is overruled.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that these precedents would justify the present occupant of the Chair in holding in order the amendment which has been presented to the House. It is in harmony with the language of the section just read. It has to do with the expenditures, both loans and appropriations, therein referred to and provided for. It goes no further than to put a limitation upon the action of the administrative officials such as Congress is warranted in making.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to discuss the point of order for a few moments. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] sought to take over any of the executive power of the President or of the administrative branches of the Government, I think I would be willing to concede that the point of order is well taken, but the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania seeks to do no such thing. It simply seeks to appoint a joint committee of the House and the Senate, which committee shall have the power to investigate the expenditure of the money which the Congress appropriates, and to that extent I do not believe it is beyond the power of Congress to adopt the amendment, and I do not believe the rules of the House are contravened by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If the Congress sought to direct the conduct of the war by the enactment of legislation, I believe that we would be taking away the power that is conferred upon the President by the Constitution, but we seek no such power. We are seeking by the introduction of this amendment only an opportunity to ascertain whether or not the moneys appropriated by the Congress are being expended as they should be expended, seeking an opportunity to investigate whether there is extravagance or corruption or any misconduct in any way in the expenditure of money paid by the people upon whose backs to-day we are levying a tax for the conduct of the war. I apprehend that every Member of the House is anxious to cooperate with the President in every way he can, and certainly no Member of the House wishes to embarrass the President in the successful conduct of the war; but, on the other hand, we want in every way to uphold the hands of the President, and to help, if possible, by the ascertainment in various cases that may arise of such information as will aid the President in the discharge of the responsible duties reposed in him by virtue of the high office which he holds. The amendment offered on a previous occasion by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] reads as follows:

* * * and insert "and a joint committee of the House and Senate on the conduct of the war, to be selected by the Congress in such manner as it shall hereafter by joint resolution direct."

In connection with the consideration of this amendment, against which the point of order was raised, the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], than whom there is no better presiding officer in the House and there is no man in the House whose knowledge of parliamentary law is greater than his, made the following ruling:

The Chair is prepared to rule. Unless the gentleman from North Carolina or the gentleman from Illinois can convince the Chair to the contrary, it seems to the Chair that this is germane. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall do certain things with the approval of the President and a joint committee of the House and Senate on the conduct of the war, etc. The Chair thinks it is germane, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Now, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is not nearly as broad as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa. It is limited in its scope in that it does not cover the field intended to be covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, and if that amendment, which sought to appoint a committee to control the conduct of the war, was in order, there can be no question in my mind that this is in order. I concede myself that the House and the Senate ought not to have a committee on controlling the conduct of the war. It was argued that a similar committee appointed during the Civil War was a source of embarrassment to the President of the United States at that time, but that committee was not appointed for the purpose intended by this committee. That committee was appointed to conduct the war, to take out of the hands of the President the conduct of the war, to appoint generals, to organize an army, and this committee is not intended for any other purpose except to scrutinize the expenditures and the moneys appropriated by the Congress of the United States. Now, it seems to me that if there is any function which the Congress of the United States is entitled to perform that function is included within the scope of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. We all want to aid the President; we want to be in a position to furnish him with information which he may not be able to obtain himself, for everybody will realize that men in the service of the Government expending the vast sums that we are appropriating, without any official responsibility, I may say, and who are not officially related to the Government, are in places to-day expending the money of the people. They have no responsibility to anybody, not even to the President, for they are under no official obligations. They are not compelled to report to the people, and we who are elected as the spokesmen of the American people, obligated by our oath of office, charged with the responsibility of levying the taxes upon the people, and with the further responsibility of appropriating the money of the people, ought by every sense of right and justice, on behalf of the people, to insist upon the right to scrutinize expenditures; and I submit, Mr. Chairman, that under all the circumstances the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be held in order.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will not feel that he is bound by his ruling just made regarding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] in this case. There is a clear line of distinction between the two propositions. I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that the question raised is not altogether clear. The Chair well knows that precedents may be found upon both sides of the case. However, I think that the Chair will be perfectly justified in holding that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order, and I suggest for the Chair's consideration a few observations upon that proposition. Three general rules, as the Chair is well aware, are given, and have been restated often in this class of cases. The first one is to the effect that one individual proposition may not be amended by another individual proposition, even though the two belong to the same class. I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is not proposed by this amendment to add a committee to the executive officers already named in the first section of this bill. It is not proposed to add a committee to the President and to the Secretary of the Treasury. The object and purpose of this amendment is entirely subsidiary to the provisions of the bill. It is not, therefore, a proposition of the same class. It is not to add another thing of the same class to those already stated.

I now call the Chair's attention to the second proposition: The second proposition is that a specific subject may not be amended by a provision general in nature, even when of the class of the specific subject. It does not need any argument to show that this amendment is not of that character.

Now we come, Mr. Chairman, to the third; and I think that I am justified in claiming that this amendment does clearly fall under the third class. The third class stated generally is as follows: The subject matter may be amended by specific propositions of the same class. Let us see now what we have here. The bill contains provisions authorizing the Government to issue bonds. We have a proposition to authorize loans. This power is given to the President, or to the Secretary of the Treasury upon the approval of the President. Now, we have a proposition added by this amendment that there shall be created an auxiliary power, an auxiliary method assisting in the carrying out and in the exercise of the power that we provide by the terms of this bill. It is suggested by this amendment that this committee of the two Houses, a coordinate branch of the Government, shall aid and assist and cooperate with the President and Secretary of the Treasury, exercising solely the executive power of the Government. It is an auxiliary power that is created and is to be given to the executive branch of the Government. It is merely that the amendment provides that we add something that may be of assistance in the performance of the duties that will devolve upon the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if such be the correct interpretation of the amendment it must be held to be germane. The very object and purpose of the bill is to authorize the issuance of bonds upon the ascertainment of certain conditions by those given power to issue the bonds. This amendment is intended to aid in the ascertainment of those conditions and thus render the duty assigned more easy of performance. That certainly is germane. I do not care to take up any further time of the Chair in arguing the proposition. If there is any force in what I have stated, then, of course, the Chair will ascertain the fact regarding it; but it seems to me that the Chair is justified, in the first place, in finding the line of distinction between this amendment and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I think that he will be clearly justified in finding that this is germane and is not cut out by the prohibited provisions excluded by decisions heretofore rendered. I think the Chairman, therefore, will be justified in finding that this amendment is germane.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is ready to rule I do not care to be heard at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. Then I will submit a few observations to the Chair in favor of the point of order.

Now, what is the bill before the House? The bill before the House is a bill to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, and to extend additional credit to foreign Governments. Now, what is the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]? I know of no way to more succinctly and better call the attention of the Chair to the amendment than the title placed over the amendment by its author, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when he introduced it as a bill. He has made some changes in the verbiage or body of the bill, but not in any wise to change the effect of it or to change the title that he himself placed over it, which title should indicate what the amendment proposes.

Now, let me read the title. It says:

Authorizing the appointment of a joint committee to cooperate with the President in promoting efficiency and preventing waste and extravagance in the conduct of the war with the Imperial German Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That has nothing whatever to do with the amendment. That was a bill introduced by me yesterday. So far as that bill is concerned, it is entirely foreign to the amendment now before the committee.

Mr. CRISP. I have just read the gentleman's amendment, and it starts out with the same language as the bill, namely, "to promote efficiency and aid the President in cooperating," and so forth.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman certainly can not hold me or any other Member of the House to a bill introduced yesterday and apply it to an amendment offered anew at this time?

Mr. CRISP. Certainly, I would not attempt to hold the gentleman, and I disclaimed it by stating before I even read the title that the gentleman had made some changes and had changed some of the body of the bill, but not enough in anywise to affect or change what the amendment really was, and it is, in my opinion, the same as the bill the title of which I just read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Since the gentleman has raised the point, would he have any objection to having the amendment read as it is at the Clerk's desk?

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection. The Chair is familiar with it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois states that he would like to have it read. I would like to have it read in view of the interpretation placed upon it by the gentleman.

Mr. CRISP. I have no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment be read in the time of the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. CRISP. Of course I am perfectly willing to submit, but I let the gentleman from Pennsylvania make his arguments on the point of order without interruption.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not interrupt the gentleman again.

Mr. CRISP. I apprehend that any member of this committee who has listened to the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will agree with my statement a moment ago that the amendment is in effect exactly what the gentleman proposed in the bill when he introduced it. Now, what does the amendment propose to do? It proposes to create legislation by providing for a joint congressional committee. It gives the committee power not only to supervise the expenditures in this bill but it gives it the power to supervise all expenditures of the Government, whether in this bill or otherwise provided, for the conduct of the war. It gives that committee power to sit during the recess of Congress. It gives that committee power to send for persons, summon witnesses, and it creates a new, distinct legislative body to cooperate with the President in the conduct of this war. Its authority and powers are not confined or limited to the bill before the House, which is a bill to raise revenue by the sale of bonds, and to loan to our allies a certain part of the money, but under the amendment the war committee would have general supervisory powers over all war expenditures.

I am not going to discuss the decision of the Speaker on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, for I know the present occupant of the Chair is very familiar with that decision, for he made the point of order at the time that decision was made. I submit, Mr. Chairman, citing the decision of the Chair just made a few moments ago, that if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET] was out of order, and I contend it was, certainly this amendment is obliged to be out of order, because it goes further. It provides for the creation of a war committee and confers upon it the power to sit when Congress is not in session. It does not confine them to passing upon the expenditures in this bill, but authorizes them to look after expenditures made in any other acts of Congress for the conduct of the war.

The bill before the House is a revenue bill. Under clause 3, Rule XXI, an amendment to be in order on a revenue bill must be germane to the subject matter in the bill. The proposed amendment creates a war committee, which is not germane to the bill, and therefore the amendment is clearly out of order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that reference has been made to a ruling by myself when the former bond bill was before the House, I think I should say just a few words.

The amendment offered a few moments ago by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLET], and which was held not to be in order by the present occupant of the chair, was certainly more closely in line with the amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Iowa upon the occasion that has been referred to, when I made the ruling, than is the amendment that is now before the body. My recollection is that there was substantially no discussion of the point of order at the time it was made and at the time I made that ruling. I ruled without argument, and I wish to say in absolute candor to the Chair and to the body, that upon a reexamination of that question a few days later I came to the conclusion that I was wrong in that ruling. I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that of course it is very well known that so far as the policy that was proposed in the ruling was concerned I was intensely opposed to it. I regard the creation of a committee as useless, if not absurd, and I gave to the gentlemen who were then offering it the benefit of whatever doubt there was in my mind at the time. As I say, it was decided without argument, and hurriedly, as I remember the House was pressing for action upon the bill. It was submitted to the House, and there was not even a division on it. There were not a dozen men in the whole House who then voted for the committee proposition. I have reexamined the question, some one having suggested to me that I probably reached an erroneous conclusion, and I think it was an erroneous ruling.

But, however that may be, certainly on the proposition that is before the Chair there is nothing to connect it with this bill in such a way as to render it germane. I am well aware of the fact, from the experience I have had in the chair, that the question of germaneness is always the most difficult point of order upon which the Chairmen or the Speakers have to pass.

But as to this proposition that is now before the Chair, Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely nothing to connect it with any single fundamental feature of the particular bill that is under consideration before the committee; not one thing.

The ruling to which the Chairman has made reference by the Speaker of the House upon the District bill was a ruling upon an appropriation bill, and it was confined to that appropriation bill to which the amendment was offered. Every power that it was thought to give to that committee had to be exercised under that bill itself. This bill is exclusively a bill providing for the issuance of bonds, and on this bill it is proposed to authorize a committee, not to do anything on earth connected with the bill itself. There was in the proposition offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] on the prior day and upon the proposition offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] to-day, at least a shadow of connection between the purpose of the bill and of the committee that it was proposed to create. But there is not a shadow of connection between the fundamental thought of this bill and the amendment that is now offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], now pending before the Chair, and I submit that it is clearly subject to a point of order. [Applause and cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was advised yesterday that this question would come up to-day, and since that time he has been examining precedents bearing on the subject. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has cited one of the precedents considered. Just as the gentleman from Pennsylvania said, the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK upon the occasion of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] providing for a special joint committee relative to the fiscal affairs and relations between the United States and the District of Columbia, is very much like the one that is under discussion now; and if that were the only case which the Chair thought was directly applicable to this the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK would be adhered to and the amendment ruled in order.

But the Chair finds that Mr. Speaker CLARK upon another occasion rendered an opinion upon a similar question. The Chair is of the opinion that the two rulings are, at least, somewhat at variance with each other. The ruling in the District of Columbia case just referred to was made by the Speaker without having looked up the subject in advance, just as the one made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], to which he himself has referred, was made. But the ruling made by Mr. Speaker CLARK on May 8, 1913, in the first session of the Sixty-first Congress, was relative to a tariff commission; and the language creating that tariff commission in the proposed amendment, on close analysis, is not unlike that of the amendment that is now offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. As just said, the ruling made by Mr. Speaker CLARK on the point of order raised to the amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD in the District appropriation bill was rendered without the consideration that he gave to the one that was made on May 8, 1913. In rendering that ruling the Speaker starts out by saying:

I have given to this question thorough consideration. By the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] and of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I was, at my own request, furnished last Monday with a copy of this motion to recommit. I have put in the larger part of the time since then in investigating all the rules, parliamentary practices, statements, precedents, arguments, and decisions on the subject.

That shows the great care that the Speaker gave to his ruling on that occasion. The ruling is rather lengthy; and, in order to support himself in the correctness of it, he has quoted from the ablest Speakers that the House of Representatives ever had.

So, while I said in the beginning that the two rulings are much upon the same questions, and that they are, at least, to some extent at variance, the Chair is going to give the preference in considering the two rulings to the one to which Mr. Speaker CLARK gave the most attention and study, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I offered was quite different from that offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. It stood on a different footing in parliamentary law, I think, entirely, as well as in its purpose, and was much less subject to a point of order. I heartily believe in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I gave my reasons for it on the floor bill. But this bill now before us leaves to the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, absolute power as to what nations he shall benefit with this $4,000,000,000, and I think that Congress, which has the right to say that these $4,000,000,000 of bonds shall be issued and given to some other nation—I think that Congress ought by itself, or, as I suggested, by a committee of five, maintain some voice in distributing the proceeds among the nations, and whether there is sufficient reason for giving away all or part of this $4,000,000,000 as the exigencies arise.

Why, Mr. Chairman, there never was a time in the world when such an enormous amount of money was placed in the hands of one man. The Secretary of the Treasury is the biggest almoner that ever existed, and there will come to him nations from all over the world beseeching him for some of this vast sum of money which we have intrusted to him. The Count of Monte Cristo and Aladdin never had under their control such vast sums as we have intrusted to a single man. I have not the slightest purpose of embarrassing or thwarting this administration. I have endeavored and shall endeavor to give it my hearty support and to do what I can for the successful prosecution of the war. I have suppressed and I expect to suppress many criticisms which I feel, because I do not wish to give comfort to the enemy, and I do not wish to detract from the popularity and power of this administration. But, on the other hand, I do not see why it is not a proper exercise of the power of Congress that when Russia or England or Belgium or Italy come forward and ask for $100,000,000 or $500,000,000, or a billion, Congress, which has control of the purse, which is supposed to supervise expenditures, should not through a small committee obtain information and express its voice as to whether that money should be loaned at that time or not. That was all my amendment suggested. It was not suggested in any partisan spirit, because the committee would be Democratic in its majority. There was no partisanship about it, and I regret that the majority will not allow it to be considered. It was not any criticism of the administration; but I will frankly say, for one, that I do not like to give Mr. McAdoo this absolute power over these stupendous sums; and, without any criticism upon him, I think it is but right that Congress, by a small committee, should in each case say whether these sums should be loaned or not.

I am for the earnest prosecution of the war. I will give to the administration my constant support for that purpose, but I do not think we should lose sight of the proper functions of the different departments of government, or that Congress should abdicate and convey unrestricted power over the allotment of four billions of dollars to Mr. McAdoo.

Mr. BATHRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. BATHRICK. If the gentleman had been on such a committee, would he have consented to the loan of $100,000,000 to Russia?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know whether I would or not. It would depend on the facts that were set before me. That is exactly what I would like to know. We have not got those facts, and some representative committee of Congress ought to have those facts and ought to know.

Mr. BATHRICK. How long does the gentleman suppose it would have taken to have brought those facts before that committee?

Mr. GILLETT. No longer than to bring them before the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BATHRICK. Does the gentleman propose that the committee should sit all the time?

Mr. GILLETT. I should think they would sit whenever a foreign Government had facts to present to show that they should be given some money. I do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury gives all his time to the issuing of these bonds, does he?

Mr. BATHRICK. Does not the gentleman remember that many Members of this House have complained within a short time that there was too much power in the hands of five people?

Mr. GILLET. It is better that this House should have some power in the hands of its own committee than that it should all be in the hands of Mr. McAdoo. I think there is some complaint in Congress and out of Congress that there is so much power in the hands of one man. That is just my argument, that a committee of five of this House would help and strengthen any one executive officer. We can not expect that every time one of these foreign Governments comes forward and asks for $500,000,000 Congress as a whole will pass upon it, although that would not be impossible, and we do not vote such sums for other purposes without investigating ourselves instead of leaving it all to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX. I think there is a lot in the gentleman's position. I want to ask if the gentleman can tell me—he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations and possibly he can tell me—whether or not the English Government, for illustration, which has been loaning a lot of money to its allies, has some committee of the kind proposed in the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. GILLET. I understand they do.

Mr. COX. Who make up the personnel of that committee in England, if the gentleman knows?

Mr. TOWNER. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me—

Mr. GILLET. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. The loans made by Great Britain are exclusively in the hands of what is called the war committee.

Mr. COX. Who compose the war committee?

Mr. TOWNER. That consists of five members of the English cabinet, who are also members of the British Parliament.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, much has been said with reference to the enormous amount appropriated by this bill, and I quite agree with what has been said to the effect that we ought to know more about what is going to be done with the money which is provided for, and I also agree with the purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. In the Committee on Ways and Means we have not had the information we desired, and we found no way to get it, and as I understand the situation now we are not likely to get it later. Notwithstanding that I expect to vote for the bill for this reason: In a general way it is easy to show that it is absolutely necessary that this bill be passed and the money provided. Some statesman of a bygone age—I have forgotten his name and it is immaterial now—once said that there were three things absolutely necessary for war—that the first was money, the second was more money, and the third was to have the most money. Those words were true 100 years ago, and they apply with redoubled force at this time. The road to success in modern war must be paved with money. The demands of modern war are insatiable, since so many nations have provided for a levy en masse and since such an enormous amount of matériel is required for the great armies that are mobilized.

The computations and comparisons that have been made with reference to the expenditures made by Great Britain and some of the other nations at war are hardly fair comparisons with the situation of our own Nation. According to a statement in the New York Times Annalist, the war expenditures of Great Britain up to the 1st of August were $25,000,000,000, and it is further understood that the expenditures of Great Britain as the war proceeds from this time on will be about $1,000,000,000 a month for that country alone. Under the terms of this bill we are expecting to loan to all of the allies $500,000,000 a month. I think that is somewhere near the monthly expenditure of France, although it is a little difficult to separate the war expenditures from the other expenditures of those Governments. Now, it is said that under the various appropriations that are made and the bond issues provided for we are to expend nearly $19,000,000,000, approaching the total expenditures of Great Britain in this war up to this time.

A comparison has also been made with a smaller amount which has been expended by Germany up to this date. Such comparisons are misleading. When this war opened Germany was prepared, as far as equipment was concerned, to the last button of every soldier. It did not have to provide a single uniform. Every uniform was prepared and marked with the number of the individual soldier to whom it belonged. The war office, as far as supplies were concerned, was provided for down to the last pin.

We had almost nothing, comparatively speaking. We were entirely without heavy artillery for use in the field, and for the ordinary field artillery we had almost nothing. We had but a few machine guns, notwithstanding Congress had been trying to get the department to purchase guns for a long time, and the money had been turned back into the Treasury. The only reason we had any in addition to those obsolete and out of date was because of a specific demand made in Congress in which I participated.

And so it went. We did not have sufficient small arms, because the arsenal at Rock Island had been shut down entirely in that respect, and production had been limited to other arsenals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We are now asked to provide for all of these matters and a thousand others that have become necessary; cantonments, uniforms, enormous supplies of ammunition which are made necessary by the conduct of modern war, which in a few hours uses up as much ammunition as was used in a year heretofore. The result is that our expenses have been mounting and will continue to mount every day as we proceed. They will undoubtedly grow greater, although there will be a time when the limit of supplies to be provided is reached.

The allies are straining every nerve possible to provide the sinews of war on their own behalf. They have come to us for the loans because it was discovered that they could not obtain them in their own markets or our market at any reasonable rate. Gentlemen will remember that when the last loan was made on the part of the allies it was a joint loan of both England and France, and one other loan was made which had to provide, in order to obtain the money, that it should be secured by the credit of the United States—that is, of railroads and other institutions which were regarded as ample security here for that purpose. Only in that way were they able to borrow on any reasonable terms whatever, and their resources are practically exhausted. We must furnish this money if we expect the war to go on with vigor, with the onward sweep that is necessary to its final success and speedy conclusion. [Applause.]

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form or forms and denomination or denominations and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate or rates of interest, not exceeding 4 per cent per annum, and time or times of payment of interest as the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time at or before the issue thereof may prescribe. The principal and interest thereof shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 16, after the word "prescribe," insert a colon and add "Provided, That no bonds issued hereunder shall be for a period of more than 30 years."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I call attention of the committee to the fact that these $4,000,000,000 in bonds are to be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom is given power to say whether they shall be for 1, 10, 20, 30, 50, 100, or a thousand years for that matter. It seems to me that, under the circumstances, in the larger feature of these loans Congress should, in delegating its authority to the Secretary, delegate only those matters which are not of the highest importance. We should exercise our own authority in fixing the important features of the bond issue.

Now, it is true that bonds issued under the last loan, that of the act of April 24, 1917, were for a period of 30 years. The Secretary exercised sound discretion and good judgment in fixing that period, but, as I said in discussing this matter some time ago, this is a direction not to an individual who occupies the secretaryship but to whoever may occupy that position. Beyond question, as to the bonds issued for the prosecution of the war, this Congress should have a definite policy. It seems to me that the men of this House, the members of this committee, each one coming from the various parts of the Republic, should have opportunity and ability to form an opinion as to about what period bonds should be permitted to run; that is, not beyond a certain period. Thirty years is the period usually described as the span of a generation. It seems to me that if we issue these bonds at this time the present generation should pay these bonds, or the major portion of them, provided, of course, that no new calamity or new great war should occur. We should place the burden on ourselves, not having consulted the next generation in the declaration or conduct of this war. The present generation should assume the debt and responsibility of liquidating the indebtedness which we now authorize. It seems to me that 30 years should be the limit. As far as I am concerned, I think it ought to be 10 years or 20 years, so that those of us who are here now and who will not have been called to participate in the great struggle, but in the midst of our activities and in the years of our perhaps greatest gainful production, would feel it incumbent on ourselves to pay all the indebtedness which we create. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, as I listened to the reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska it would provide in the statute that the life of the bonds authorized should not extend beyond 30 years. The proposition of the gentleman, I think, would come with more force if it applied to the bond authorization for domestic purposes instead of a bond issue for the purpose of foreign loans. The principal portion of the bonds authorized by this bill is to raise money to loan to foreign Governments in return for bonds which those Governments will give to the United States Government containing the same provisions as to maturity, rates of interest, and so forth. Those Governments are naturally expected to pay this money back.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman is under a misapprehension as to the section to which the amendment is proposed. This amendment is offered to section 1, which does not deal with the foreign loan.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As section 1 is now amended, I think it does.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I do not think I misunderstood the amendment. The point I was undertaking to make is this: We do not expect, as taxpayers in this country, to pay off the amount of money loaned to these Governments. We expect the interest that they pay to meet the interest which will accrue against this Government, and the principal which they will ultimately pay will wipe out the bonds which we propose to issue here, the proceeds of which we shall loan to the allied Governments. Suppose they are not able at the end of 30 years to liquidate this entire amount? They will be overloaded with their own domestic indebtedness apart from these foreign credits which they are securing, and I think a different rule at least should apply to our domestic loans made for domestic purposes from that which should be applied to the loan made to the allies. We are obliged to consider to some extent their condition and their wishes in regard to the terms of maturity. As I heard the gentleman's amendment, it would by statute provide that no bonds issued under authority of this act and no bonds into which these bonds might be converted could have their life extended beyond 30 years. That might tie the hands of our debtors, for it might be impossible for all these bonds to be met within 30 years.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman think that it would be advisable for us under any circumstances to assume a bonded relationship with any of these countries covering a period of more than 30 years? Does not the gentleman think that rather than have long periods of bonded relationship with these other countries the period should be shortened?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I have this view, as I was undertaking to say, that we do not consider this loan a debt of our own. We expect our debtors to wipe it out. If in view of their local indebtedness, with this foreign debt added to it, they should be unable to extinguish our portion within 30 years, I would rather be in a position to extend the loan beyond 30 years than to lose the debt.

Mr. SLOAN. By loaning money to these foreign nations we profess to be saving them, and instead of paying their private obligations or their domestic matters first, I think they should first pay off the debt by means of which their national existence is guaranteed; and are we asking any too much when we insist that within 30 years these obligations be paid? Thirty years is a long time for one nation to be the creditor of another, taking into consideration the various complications that may arise in the course of human and national events between nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with the gentleman's views as to the limited time within which the Government would like to have payment of these foreign loans made and also the time within which they, our debtors, will doubtless expect and earnestly hope to make the payment, but if by any unforeseen circumstances it should become impossible for them to meet these payments I doubt the advisability of fixing an ironclad statute which would not permit one of these bonds or a bond into which one of them might be converted to be extended beyond 30 years.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not entirely probable that in the event of the conditions transpiring which the gentleman has recited, the bonds would be refunded, and refunded under conditions then existing better than they could be extended now, for a much longer period?

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. I undertook to refer to that by saying that if the statute expressly provides that any bond authorized by this act shall not live longer than 30 years, it is not at all certain that a bond into which one of such bonds might be converted, could be extended beyond the same period.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, the exact length of time these bonds shall run, in my judgment, should not be rigidly fixed at this time by Congress. A maximum limit, however, should be fixed by the Congress; and if I were fixing the limit, I would fix it at a shorter period than 30 years. There will come a time within the next few years when these bonds could all be refunded at a much lower rate of interest than it will be necessary for them to bear at this time. Therefore, I think anything that can be done here to-day or during the consideration of this bill that will make it necessary to refund them will probably relieve the country from paying a heavy rate of interest and enable the bonds to be refunded at a much lower rate than they will necessarily carry if the life of the bonds is fixed rigidly now for a long period.

Mr. SLOAN. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury should, in the exercise of his discretion, fix the maximum at 40 or 50 years? How would it be possible for them to be refunded then?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I say that I do not think we should rigidly fix the life of the bonds, but I do think that we should fix a time beyond which they should not run; and rather than make it 30 years I would make it 15 years if I were directing the trend that this legislation shall take, and I would fix a maximum of 15 years, with a view of refunding the bonds at a much lower rate of interest than it will be necessary for them to carry at this time.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the committee discussed at length, by themselves and with the Secretary of the Treasury, the maturity feature of these bonds. Some of the committee thought it ought to be limited to 30 years—some of them possibly to 50 years—but after considering the whole question and all the circumstances, most of the committee members were of the opinion that we had better not restrict it to any number of years. The Secretary seems to think that they would not run longer than 30 years—from 15 to 30 years, he said—but there are some circumstances which may hereafter arise in which it would be necessary to extend them beyond 30 years, and I trust the committee will not agree to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the yeas seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. SLOAN) there were—ayes 28, noes 73.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 13, after the word "exceeding" strike out the word "four" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three and a half."

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, I present this motion simply in one way to express my individual views about what rate of interest these bonds should bear. In my opinion, which probably is not worth much as against the opinion of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means or the Secretary of the Treasury, the rate of interest on our new issue of bonds should not bear 4 per cent interest. The first offer of our bonds was made at 3½ per cent interest. The offer was made to the Nation: 4,000,000 of people responded and subscribed about $3,000,000,000 for bonds at 3½ per cent. It was very gratifying not only to the Secretary of the Treasury but to all the people of the United States. Now, I do not know of any condition of things, financial or otherwise, that has made it necessary to increase the rate of interest upon our bonds from 3½ to 4 per cent. I have read pretty carefully the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury and I find there is largely an absence of any facts to justify his recommendation that these bonds should be issued at 4 per cent. There is another proposition. I think the Secretary of the Treasury stated that there would probably be a large amount of these bonds at 3½ per cent that never would be converted from 3½ per cent to 4 per cent bonds. I heard a very distinguished gentleman, sitting on my right, make the remark that the 3½ per cent bonds untaxed were better than the 4 per cent bonds, subject to the supertax and surtax, and that he would not exchange his. Now, then, if that be true, what are we to gain, what has the Nation to gain? We started at 3½ per cent. You now propose a 4 per cent bond. If the war continues there will probably be other issues of bonds and the next time it will be 4½ per cent, and so on, going up and up.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Does the gentleman's proposal also cover the exemption from income taxes?

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; I think not. I believe it is a better principle for this Nation to put its bonds out absolutely free of taxes. I believe this idea of putting on these supertaxes and surtaxes will make confusion, confusion in the minds of the public and in the minds of the investors and absolutely injure the sale of the bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury in his testimony all along stated that the bond proposition must be made plain to the people and that complications would confuse investors. This would injure the sale of bonds. But a 4 per cent bond only partially exempt from taxes will make it very difficult for the people to understand. Now, I want to read just a few words from Secretary McAdoo's statement in regard to this matter. He says:

It is not just my opinion I am expressing here—

That is, in regard to the recommendation for 4 per cent bonds—I have had the opportunity of hearing from bankers all over the country who have written me about this matter. Some of them do not think the basis should be changed. There are some localities where they feel very strongly that the 3 per cent bond, with all the present exemptions, should be retained.

Now he proposes it as a matter of mere conjecture, a matter of doubt, a matter of uncertainty, a matter of opinion, after we have made a record in selling the 3½ per cent bonds that has not been equaled in the history of any other nation in the world. Why should we go at once under mere conjecture to a 4 per cent bond?

Another thing, in my judgment, is that to increase the Government-bond interest rate to some extent reduces the value of industrial bonds of all kinds and of all State, county, and municipal bonds. The interest which the Government pays sets the standard of interest. If we pay 3½ per cent there is a certain rate above that at which the others can borrow. If we pay 4 per cent, others will go above that, and when we raise the standard of the Government a half per cent we raise the rate of interest for State, county, municipal, and corporation bonds. This will affect the value of the vast quantities of securities of the Nation. So, in my honest judgment, we are making a great mistake, and I believe we had better let it stay at 3½ per cent. Our people responded patriotically before and I believe they will buy these bonds, not so much because of the income as they will because they will feel it a patriotic duty to buy them. If we can not float them at 3½ per cent, in my judgment we can not float them at 4 per cent. I think it is better to offer them at 3½ per cent. If we then fail, there will then be time to go to 4 per cent or 4½ per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, there are many reasons why the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma should not prevail, in my opinion.

In fact, I would go even further and make these bonds subject entirely to Federal taxation. It will be noticed that of this total issue, $4,000,000,000, or more than half of it, is to go to the allies. We are partially exempting these bonds from taxes for the benefit of the allies. So far as I am concerned, in my individual opinion, there is no reason why these bonds, issued for the benefit of the allies, should not be subject to Federal taxation, and I favored such a proposition in the committee. But, at all events, we ought not to entirely exempt them from taxation under any theory that is given with reference to exempting United States bonds from taxes. But if we are to continue with this process, Mr. Chairman, we are going to have an incalculable amount of property in this country which is not subject to taxation, either State or Federal, provided we continue on the plan suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN]. There is now some $8,000,000,000 in bonds issued by local authorities; that is, by States and cities, which are not subject to taxation. There is an enormous amount of property belonging to churches and colleges that is not subject to taxation. There are the bonds that have been issued before the prospect of this war, which are not subject to taxation; there are the 3½ per cents which we have just issued. Before the war is over there will probably be more, until there will be, if we continue on this plan, such a great portion of the property of the United States not subject to taxation that an undue and onerous burden will be laid upon those who do not own such bonds.

I think we have not gone really far enough in this bill. We ought to make the rate such that these bonds could be subject to taxation in all forms provided by the Federal Government. Of course, they would be exempt from State and local taxation. But, at any rate, the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] ought not to prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SLOAN: Page 2, line 12, after the word "issue," strike out the word "conversion."

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to see this amended, and this is the first place in the bill, I think, providing for the conversion of other bonds.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I suggest that by unanimous consent we pass it over, and when it comes to the convertible section he can offer his amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. My purpose was to strike out "convertible" wherever I found it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Nebraska will be considered as pending, for further consideration.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to establish credits with the United States for any foreign governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States; and, to the extent of the credits so established from time to time, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to purchase, at par, from such foreign governments, respectively, their several obligations hereafter issued, bearing such rate or rates of interest, maturing at such date or dates, not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under the authority of this act, and containing such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine, or to make advances to or for the account of any such foreign governments and to receive such obligations at par for the amount of any such advances; but the rate or rates of interest borne by any such obligations shall not be less than the highest rate borne by any bonds of the United States which, at the time of the acquisition thereof, shall have been issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, and any such obligations shall contain such provisions as the Secretary of the Treasury may from time to time determine for the conversion of any such obligations into obligations bearing a higher rate of interest if bonds of the United States issued under authority of said act approved April 24, 1917, or of this act, shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest, but the rate of interest in such foreign obligations shall not be less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized to enter into such arrangements from time to time with any such foreign governments as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for the payment of such obligations of foreign governments before maturity. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000,000,000, and in addition thereto the unexpended balance of the appropriations made by section 2 of said act approved April 24, 1917, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to establish credits for foreign governments, as aforesaid, shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

At this point it has been suggested an amendment might be offered looking to the appointment of a joint congressional committee; that would be in order. But the Chair has already ruled on this question twice, and perhaps it might be just as well to permit it to go over until a motion to recommit can be made. However, at this point I wish to comment briefly upon the system of making these foreign loans. The public has very little information as to the manner in which these tremendous, these colossal, amounts of money are disposed of. Up to date we have already made, or authorized to be made, loans amounting to $3,000,000,000. This particular section of the bill now under consideration proposes additional loans to the amount of $4,000,000,000, which will make available for the purpose of loans to foreign nations an aggregate of $7,000,000,000. Now, that is an enormous charge upon the people of the United States. It equals $70 per man, woman, and child. It is nearly $2,000,000,000 more than the actual money in circulation in the United States. That is what we have done, and what we are doing by this bill, for our allies. And this enormous sum of money, aggregating $7,000,000,000, is by the terms of this bill at the exclusive disposal of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President.

The relations between the Secretary of the Treasury and the President who appoints the Secretary of the Treasury, are necessarily very close. And it might be, in a free country, where autocracy and despotism do not prevail, that in a matter so vital to every individual of this free land of ours there should be some consultation in the matter of enormous loans to nations that may be strong or to nations that may be tottering, with the representatives of the people who have to pay the bill. It is mighty easy to create loans.

It is mighty hard to pay the interest upon those loans and to pay the principal when called, and the people of the country, through their representatives, ought to have something to say about it. It is not for me to predict that within the short period of six months the newspapers of this country, whose voice is unanimous now in support of the President of the United States, may be taking an entirely different tack if a great ground swell of public sentiment arises from every home in this land with respect to the boys dead in the trenches and with respect to the taxes and the mortgages that will have to be levied in order that this great war bill must be paid. From this side of the House have come two amendments this morning proposing that the representatives of the people shall have some voice in the disposition of these colossal sums of money. But the majority has decided, and in this case technically decided, that the one voice that shall determine the disposition of these funds shall be that of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, who appointed him to the office he occupies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The testimony that appears in the printed hearings, that come somewhat belated to the main body of the Members of the House, does not go fully into details as to all these bond transactions, because, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury, a most estimable man, it might be contrary to the public interests.

From my point of view, as I listened to the Secretary of the Treasury in his very able statement and explanation of the method of creating the loans and protecting this Nation with regard to their repayment, it seemed to me that nothing that he said would be dangerous to this country or inimical to the allies whom we are doing so much to assist and with whom we are cooperating in the field.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Does the gentleman intimate that the testimony as published differs in principle or in any particular matter from the testimony given before the committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not intimate; I would state that the printed hearings which are now before the Members of the House do not contain the full statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Were the hearings public?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The hearings were private. They were in executive session, for what we might call "reasons of State."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was the Secretary permitted to change his remarks and cut out portions that had been given to the committee and afterwards to be denied to the Members of the House?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not wish the gentleman to draw me into a position of revealing the secrets of the committee, but I think the chairman and the members will pardon me when I say that the Secretary made certain reservations, and it was agreed by the committee that it would be fair for him to make those reservations if he thought that what he might reveal would be prejudicial to the interests of our allies or to ourselves.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. I do not know whether I understood the gentleman correctly or not, but I did understand the gentleman to say that he is satisfied that this country is amply protected as to all of the loans that we are making to the allies.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not say that. The Secretary made some reference to that matter, following up questions that were put to him; and I would like to say this—

Mr. SABATH. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania satisfied now that every precaution is being taken on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to protect the interests of our Nation as to these loans that we are going to make?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not thoroughly satisfied that every dollar we lend may come back to the Treasury of the United States. I hope, as I believe the Secretary of the Treasury believes, that it will come back; but I am inclined to think that some of the money which goes out of the Treasury of the United States under the sole discretion conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury may never return to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SABATH. But you give him the power to protect the Nation so that the money will be repaid to the country?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is a matter of judgment altogether. I said a little while ago that it was fairly easy to borrow money on bonds but it is extremely difficult to collect it in taxes, and I say now, with regard to these greater matters of financial concern—the lending of a total of $7,000,000,000—it is far easier for the Secretary of the Treasury—this one or some successor of his—whose heart may be big and generous, to lend the money which this Congress appropriates to his sole disposal than it is for him to collect that money when the time of payment comes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I wish to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 3, line 17, after the words "United States," where they first occur, insert "after an investigation and a report is first made by a board composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce and the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, to determine the advisability of extending and the amount of the credits herein provided for to foreign governments."

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to have that appear after the words "United States" where they first appear in the line—page 3, line 17. I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will not make the point of order. It will oblige me to argue it if he insists.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. I make the point of order. It has already been ruled on twice to-day—the same principle.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair will hear me on the point of order. If the Chair is going to hold that this amendment is subject to a point of order, then we might just as well pass by the consideration of all the amendments to this bill and vote the bill without the crossing of a "t" or dotting of an "i," as reported by the committee.

It is true that this is a revenue bill, and that the special rule adopted by the Democratic caucus when they came into power, which limited the authority of the House of Representatives on revenue bills to consider amendments as are germane to the items of the bill applies. But that rule by which it was sought to throttle the activities and the action of the Republican side of the House of Representatives in amending revenue bills does not go to the extent of depriving it of the consideration of germane amendments to any items in the bill.

I am surprised that the gentleman from North Carolina, in charge of the bill, should assert his privilege of making the point of order in an effort to in some wise scatter the absolute authority that every one on both sides of the aisle concedes is vested in the Secretary of the Treasury in the disposition of this enormous and unheard of amount of $7,000,000,000 to the allied governments in the war.

What does this amendment propose to do? The bill as introduced provides that upon the ipse dixit of the Secretary of the Treasury alone, subject, of course, to the approval of the President—but that is merely a rubber-stamp approval; the President can not go into the merits of the question of loans of such gigantic amounts to these foreign powers—he should have the authority to loan five additional billion dollars to the allied governments; $4,000,000,000 provided in this bill and $1,000,000,000, which was provided in the act of April 24 last, which has not been utilized.

I am surprised that the leader of the majority should attempt to assert a technical rule in order to prevent the centering of this authority not in any legislative committee of the House but in members of the Cabinet, of the President's own choosing, and one other man, namely, the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, all of these men chosen as selected advisers of the President. Why do I designate the Secretary of State? Because it is his duty to inquire into the diplomatic affairs of the respective allied foreign Governments. Why do I designate the Secretary of the Treasury? Naturally, because he is the finance minister of the Government. Why do I select the Secretary of Commerce? Because he is acquainted with the commercial activities and conditions of the allied Governments. I designate the Secretary of the Interior because he can be an arbiter to pass upon these great questions, and I name the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board because he is the representative of the Government so far as banking affairs are concerned.

The amendment purposes having a preliminary investigation by this board as to the advisability, purposes, and need of these loans by the foreign Governments. As I understand the procedure followed by Great Britain in making loans to allied Governments, their war committee determines first all these preliminary questions before making the loan. Such great power should not be vested in any one official.

Now, coming directly to the point of order, I am quite well aware, and the Chair is well aware, that the general rule as to germaneness is embodied in paragraph 7 of Rule XIII. That is further limited by the rule I referred to a moment ago, namely, that found in paragraph 3 of Rule XXI, which reads as follows:

No amendment shall be in order to any bill affecting revenue which is not germane to the subject matter in the bill; nor shall any amendment to any item of such bill be in order which does not directly relate to the item to which the amendment is proposed.

I wish to address myself to the consideration of that rule, and to present to the Chair the fact that this amendment is within the inclusion of those two requirements of that later ruling which was incorporated for the first time in the rules in the Sixty-second Congress. Certainly it is germane to the subject matter of the bill. It relates directly to the issuance of these bonds, and this bill provides a certain method in which this loan may be made to foreign Governments. It provides that it shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President. I merely add a further condition, that it shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President upon an investigation and report by a board.

The Chairman will not deny, and no one will deny, that if I had offered an amendment saying that these loans shall be made to these foreign governments by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State, or adding other Cabinet members, subject to the approval of the President, it would be in order; nor will the Chairman hold, if he follows the logic of his mind, that when this bill provides one method in which these loans may be made to these foreign governments—that is, by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President—that the House of Representatives can not add a further condition and say not only with the approval of the President but with the approval of a board. Great as is the power of the President—and we are investing him with autocratic powers of the highest kind, because we realize them to be necessary by reason of the exigencies of war—nevertheless, in view of the fact that the House in the bill that has been reported by the Committee on Ways and Means states that these bonds shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, the House has the right to add another body if it sees fit to do so, and to provide that this action shall also be subject to the approval of a board, or upon investigation made by a board. This is no extraneous matter. It is certainly right in line with the very provisions of the bill as reported by the committee. They set forth that it shall be subject to the approval of one person. I provide that it shall be subject to the approval also, before action is taken, of a board consisting of five members, who, so far as four of them are concerned, are members of the official family of the President.

Is this amendment germane to any item in such bill? Why, can the Chair hold, with the bill reported by the committee, in the phraseology it is, that these bonds shall be issued by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President, that the House of Representatives, in its supreme judgment, has not the right to vote upon the question that it shall be subject to the approval not only of the President but of some one else? That is it in a nutshell.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not even ask that. You simply ask that they investigate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The prior rulings and decisions were on matters that did not affect revenue bills, save the decision made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT], to which he adverted here a little while ago. That decision is on all fours with the rule that I contend should be upheld in this instance, that in the amendment of this bill we have the right to offer any germane amendment that is directly related to the item under consideration. It is akin, directly related, to the provisions as reported by the committee. This amendment merely amplifies the conditions as laid down by the committee itself in the way these bonds should be loaned to the foreign governments. For that reason I respectfully submit that the amendment is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair before ruling wishes to call attention to the language used in the amendment which is offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin. It will be noted that the language of the amendment, if adopted, will be inserted after the first use of the words "United States," in line 17 of page 3. Up to that point the Secretary of the Treasury can do certain things with the approval of the President. Then follows the language of the amendment, which says that—

A board composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, shall determine the advisability of extending, and the amount of the credits, herein provided for to foreign governments.

That evidently provides for an advisory board, just as the amendment did in the ruling to which the Chair has heretofore referred, made by Mr. Speaker CLARK on May 8, 1913.

The Chair is very decidedly of the opinion that the ruling of Mr. Speaker CLARK upon that amendment is applicable to this one also, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MADDEN. I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any disposition whatever on the part of the Government of the United States to obtain all the information that is accessible before making disposition of the vast sums of money that are being appropriated by the Congress, the opportunity is offered by the amendment presented by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD]. There is no provision in the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Wisconsin to take any power away from the Secretary of the Treasury or to take away the power of the President of the United States to approve the action of the Secretary of the Treasury. The provisions of the amendment simply are that before action is taken by the Secretary of the Treasury he should be advised by a board selected and authorized to investigate the facts in the case. The board proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin is given no power whatever to approve or disapprove of the disposition of these funds. It is proposed that this board should be empowered to investigate, to ascertain the facts, and to disclose these facts to the men who are authorized in the bill to make disposition of the money. No power is taken away from the Secretary of the Treasury; there is no embarrassment to the President, but only an opportunity afforded to the Secretary of the Treasury to act with greater intelligence because of the greater information that might be placed at his disposal.

The record of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee with respect to the loans made to the allies discloses the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury has no information upon which to base the loans made to the allies except such information as the allies choose to give. The Secretary says so himself. I but repeat what he said to the Committee on Ways and Means when I make this assertion. He says that the only information that we can have is the information which they give. Now, is it too much to ask on behalf of the American people that a board consisting of the members of the President's Cabinet shall be given the power to investigate, and if possible to ascertain the facts surrounding the statements made by the allied representatives?

It is said by the Secretary of the Treasury in his own testimony before the Committee on Ways and Means that the ambassador representing the country seeking the loan comes before him and gives him such facts as he may, and upon the facts disclosed by that statement of the ambassador the loans of this money are made.

What harm can there be in adopting a more comprehensive system of investigation on our own account. What is there that ought to prevent us from having an agency of our own to investigate? What objection can there be to it? Is there any good reason any man on earth can give why we should not obtain all the information that it is possible to obtain through some independent board before finally acting on the loan to be made to anybody? What is there sacred about the allies that we must loan them money regardless of the facts? Why do we hamstring ourselves, our Government, and our people by preventing the investigation that can be made by men of eminent standing and ability, men who have the confidence of the President of the United States, men appointed by the President of the United States to conduct the affairs of the Nation? Can there be any objection on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to his colleagues in the Cabinet being selected as advisers on so important a question as this? I apprehend not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I believe that the membership of this House must ultimately come to the conclusion that it is the duty of the House and of the Senate of the United States to see that a committee shall be appointed on the conduct of the war. More especially, Mr. Chairman, is it needed in regard to these foreign loans.

I realize that the majority take their position because of the attitude of the administration in opposition to the appointment of this committee. But, gentlemen, it is to your interest as much as it is to ours that we should have knowledge regarding these important things. You should understand as members of the majority that it is a tremendous responsibility which you take and which we ask you to share with us regarding the conduct of this war. It is not for partisan advantage. If we were seeking that we would say, "Take this responsibility and we will hold you to strict accountability to the people and the country for it."

Take this matter of loans: We are now giving to the Secretary of the Treasury alone the power to determine whether the billions of money shall be loaned to foreign Governments, a thing never before proposed in any other government of the world. It is the practice in Great Britain when foreign loans have been made that they shall be considered by the committee on the conduct of the war. That committee consists of five members of the cabinet who are also members of the House of Parliament. These members consider in each particular instance whether a loan shall be made to a particular foreign Government, and upon their report to Parliament each particular loan is approved and made.

And yet here we give the Secretary of the Treasury $4,000,000,000 and say you may loan it to whom you please, to which of these nations you choose among those who are our allies, and upon such terms as you choose. It seems to me, gentlemen, that this ought not to be done. It is not because we distrust a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury; it is because we say that such power ought not to be left to the judgment of any one man on earth. We ought at least to have it considered by more than one man. We ought to have it at least considered by the representatives of the people who are to pay this immense sum of money.

Gentlemen should understand that we are here abdicating our power when we say that we give this immense sum of money to the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of as he pleases. We are not determining whether a foreign loan should or should not be made; we are not determining whether this amount should or should not be given to a particular foreign government. We are leaving that to the determination of one man. We are giving away the power of the people by denying it to ourselves, and it is a tremendous responsibility to do that. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not required to do so in this instance and we should not do it in the interest of the people, in the interest of our allies, and in the interest of the cause that we hope to carry to a triumphant conclusion in this war. I hope the members of the majority will consider this and agree with us that it is necessary for the safety of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes beyond the five minutes allowed him under the rule. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I believe there is no amendment pending, and therefore I ask leave to speak for a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hardly think, Mr. Chairman, I shall need all that time. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we have a government consisting of three branches—the legislative, the executive, and the judicial. Under our Constitution the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. We are in a state of war. The expenditures this year, I apprehend, with our advances, getting ready for war under stress, will, conservatively, be not greatly within $20,000,000,000. As a part of this campaign Congress has already authorized by former legislation the financing of our allies. They are our allies; their interests in this contest are our interests, and ours theirs. The President, as the Executive and Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, outside of the advances to the allies, after we have appropriated the money, will expend or obligate, substantially expend, in raising an army and creating a navy, securing proper arms and munitions of war, proper transportation, and so forth, fourteen or fifteen billions of dollars. The advances, I believe, are to amount to $6,000,000,000. Where we have three coordinate branches of the Government, as we have, I am a believer in letting each branch of the Government exercise its functions. I believe in responsibility. Suppose some one is dishonest. Under that same Constitution there is the power of impeachment. A Cabinet officer may be impeached, any official may be impeached, but that is a remedy that we are not liable to resort to, so far as I can see or forecast. I am more anxious about the proper expenditure of the money which Congress has authorized and will authorize, so far as the fourteen or fifteen billions of dollars are concerned, than I am about the advances to our allies. If advances are made to the allies after authorization, there ought not to be any undue delay, and there ought not to be any undue delay in making any of these expenditures.

The President is the Executive. The Secretary of the Treasury and other members of the Cabinet are his assistants and are liable to removal at any hour or day. He is the responsible party, the coordinate branch of the Government, and as to these advances the Secretary of the Treasury is to make the advance upon the approval of the President. If I were discussing the amendment which is not before the House, I should be inclined to believe that the addition of the other members of the Cabinet might lead to undue delay, especially as they are subject to removal at any time. You may say, "Will nothing be wasted, will no mistake be made?" Ah, there will be much waste. Fourteen billions of dollars, plus six billions of advances—

Mr. MADDEN. Seven billions.

Mr. CANNON. Seven billions, the gentleman says—I am speaking in round terms—can not be expended under stress without waste. I do not want waste. You gentlemen on the other side ought to be quite as anxious about the expenditure being properly made as we upon this side, and we upon this side as anxious as you upon that side. I am a strong partisan Republican so far as the policies of that great party are concerned, but I know no partisanship in the making of appropriations in the preparation for this great contest. [Applause.] I shall not speak of a committee to supervise the Executive; it is not before us. Unless something so serious develops in this period of stress, in this contest, as to indicate that some official of the Government ought to be removed or impeached, I am inclined to think—and I am giving now my opinion, my feeling—that the best way is to let all the effort of the legislative branch of the Government go toward upholding the hand of the executive branch of the Government. Too many cooks, so far as the command of the armies is concerned and the expenditure of money, sometimes may spoil the broth. I feel that I ought to say what I have said in justice to myself. I have high respect for the gentlemen who do not agree with me upon this side of the House and upon the other side of the House. I am merely giving expression to my feelings as a Member of Congress, a Republican, and a citizen of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just taken his seat, has given such strong, such forceful, such clear reasons why the Executive should not be handicapped with a board or committee as has been suggested here this afternoon, that I shall say nothing with respect to that. I leave his argument as mine, for he has made it so much better than I possibly could.

I do want to say in further answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH], propounded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that with respect to the loans which this Government has already made to the allies, the Secretary of the Treasury in his testimony or statement before our committee impressed every single man upon the committee—Republican, Democratic, and Progressive—with the fact that every dollar of loan made to each of the allies was a most wise thing to do under the circumstances, and I venture the assertion that after they heard his statement, not a man upon the committee but would have made the loan exactly as the President and Secretary of the Treasury made it. I make this assertion. There is not a man in this House now who, if he had heard the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, would not, if he had the power, have made the exact loans to each of the allies that this Government has already done. Of course, all will appreciate that many things the Secretary of the Treasury said to us in executive session can not be repeated here. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], I am sure, if his time had not expired, would have made practically the statement that I have made, and I am sure the Secretary of the Treasury impressed him with the fact that the loans that have been made were most wise under the circumstances.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the gentleman free to state or does he feel that he is justified in stating publicly to the House how many million dollars were loaned to the provisional government under Kerensky through Ambassador Bakhmétéff?

Mr. KITCHIN. A credit was established with this Government for the Russian Government up to $275,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Established how?

Mr. KITCHIN. They had a tentative agreement that they might allot that much to the Russian Government. The tentative agreement was such that if the circumstances warranted it we would loan the Russian Government up to $275,000,000; but under the actual circumstances we afterwards issued them only $87,500,000—

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What did we take—bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. We took a certificate, practically a demand note from the representatives of the Russian Government here as we did from the representatives of the British and French Governments when we made loans to them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then the security which was taken for this $87,500,000 loaned to the Kerensky government consists of what is in legal effect a promissory note?

Mr. KITCHIN. Practically that.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Signed by whom?

Mr. KITCHIN. Signed by the representative of the Russian Government here.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The ambassador?

Mr. KITCHIN. The duly accredited representative of that Government, of course.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was it signed by anybody except Ambassador Bakhmétéff?

Mr. KITCHIN. No. I think that is about all we ought to go into that matter.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman concluded?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will conclude.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeds I would like to ask the chairman a question or two simply for information. Now, in issuing these bonds part of them are to go to foreign countries and part are to be used here; is there any difference on the face of those bonds as to when those two classes of bonds are to become due?

Mr. KITCHIN. There is no difference in the bonds we issue. We appropriated in the act of April 24, $3,000,000,000 to be loaned to the allies. We appropriate $4,000,000,000 more by this bill for the same purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How long do those bonds run?

Mr. KITCHIN. We just decided not to have any definite maturity, but the Secretary of the Treasury thought the bonds would be made to mature within 30 years—from 15 to 30 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I would like to ask the chairman or anybody else who wants to answer it is this: Would it not be better to have this new issue of bonds made serial bonds and become due year by year?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is provided; yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What about these foreign bonds?

Mr. KITCHIN. Those bonds will bear a rate of interest not less than the rate on the bonds of the United States and will have a maturity not longer than the maturity of the United States bonds.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the chairman think that we can pay off the foreign debt—if you want to call it that—the foreign bonds, as quickly as we can bonds used for domestic purposes?

Mr. KITCHIN. There will be no difference in bonds used for domestic purposes. Suppose we issue $7,000,000,000 of bonds and we want the proceeds of $3,000,000,000 for domestic purposes and $4,000,000,000 for foreign purposes. The bonds will be the same for domestic as well as foreign purposes. When we take the bonds of one of the allied Governments to whom we make a loan, then that bond must correspond with the rate of interest and have a maturity not later than the maturity of those bonds that are issued by the United States Government. They can make the bond mature in a shorter time but not in a longer time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When is the first time that these bonds can be paid off?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is left to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury and the President. He proposes, as I understand it, as he did with these $2,000,000,000 bonds, to make them serial bonds running from 15 to 30 years. Possibly he may extend some to 40 years.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This thing happened about Civil War bonds in our public debt. After we got on our feet again and began taking in more revenue than we needed, the bonds were not due fast enough, and the Secretary of the Treasury made the proposition that they would practically refund them with the issue of new bonds at a lower rate of interest. You took a bond in there and they would stamp it on the back, a 4 per cent bond bearing 2½ per cent interest. Now, it is just as certain as two and two make four that after this war is over—I do not mean the day after it is over, but within a comparatively short time—the United States can refund every dollar of its debt at 3 per cent and 2 per cent and 2½ per cent, and before this war began my judgment was that the entire debt of the United States Government could have been refunded at 1 per cent or 1½ per cent if you make the bonds run long enough.

Mr. GARNER. May I interrupt the gentleman now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. If the Speaker will look over the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee, he will see where the Secretary of the Treasury stated that he intended to make those bonds in series where they would take up each year a certain amount and later on will have to have another bond issue, and we may have to have emergency certificates coming due at any time, some may be placed in emergency certificates, and in that way you will be able to refund a large part of this bonded indebtedness immediately after the war.

Now, may I make another suggestion with reference to the foreign Governments? In this certificate they give for this money, in the form of a promissory note, they agree to make the conditions of the bonds such as the Secretary of the Treasury may demand, which he can make a short or long period of time, as he may desire?

Mr. KITCHIN. The life of the foreign obligation can not be for a longer period than the period provided in the United States bond.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All of these questions I ask, or what I say, are simply to expedite the paying off of this war debt and the refunding of it at a lower rate of interest, because I know that Secretary Shaw took in a vast volume of them when he was Secretary of the Treasury and cut the interest down and made a great saving; and some of the other Secretaries did that, too.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can not go quite so far as the gentleman from North Carolina did in the statement just made, in that every gentleman of the committee would have loaned the money as the Secretary of the Treasury did. I think there are some of the members of the committee who, while they sympathized with the Secretary in making the loans, would like to have had more information, or, perhaps, would have been glad to consult a little more before making the loans. The Secretary, however, wanted more discretion to loan money and to dispose of the securities which would come into his possession. I read from a portion of the testimony, on page 10 of the hearings, where we had this very question under discussion. The Secretary said:

Our experience thus far has convinced us that we ought not to be tied in that way.

This was with respect to the maturity of the bonds.

We ought to have a freer hand in determining not only the maturities of the loans that we make to them, but also in determining the substance and general character of the obligation that we shall take from them.

And that meant, I will say to the members of the committee, that it was intended the Secretary should have power and discretion not only to fix the maturity of the bonds given by these foreign Governments, but that he should also have the power and the discretion to sell them below par or at any price that he might see fit. He had his reasons for it.

I pause for a moment to have any member of the committee correct me if I made a misstatement as to that desire on the part of the Treasury Department. As no one responds, I repeat that it was the intent of the department to have this bill so framed that the Secretary could take over these obligations of the foreign countries, could hold them as long as he saw fit, and could dispose of them at any price he saw fit, which was a proposition that some of us certainly did not subscribe to.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Since the gentleman has mentioned that matter, is it not but fair to the Secretary that he should give the reasons which the Secretary assigned for requesting the authority and extent to which he would go in selling any of these bonds below par if given the authority?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would be very glad to have those reasons stated if any other gentleman cares to state them, but I still want to keep faith with the committee and not repeat here those things that were practically expunged from the record of the Ways and Means Committee. This much is printed:

Mr. MOORE. Are those foreign securities brought here by the foreign commissioners?

Secretary McADOO. These loans are made always with the representative of the country; that is, the representative authorized to act for the foreign Government, generally the ambassador or minister.

Mr. MOORE. Would you care to suggest the method by which the United States is protected in the actual control of these obligations?

Secretary McADOO. We take the obligations of those Governments in due form in each instance. They are the obligations of the Government concerned to pay back to us the amount of money advanced to it.

Mr. MOORE. They are preparatory to the delivery of their bonds?

Secretary McADOO. They are short-time or demand obligations, which will be converted into bonds.

Mr. MOORE. And they remain in the Treasury Department here at Washington?

Secretary McADOO. Yes, sir.

Now, there was more testimony, which does not appear here, bearing upon the manner in which these loans are arranged and as to the protection that the United States has with respect to the loans.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think it proper to inform the Committee of the Whole as to the facts about the loan with Serbia? In the report of the committee there is a letter from Mr. Crosby, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in which it is shown that the loan made to Serbia was only $1,000,000. Only $1,000,000 would not do much at this time for war preparations. For what purpose was that used?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The loan made was only $1,000,000, but a credit of $3,000,000 was given. That amount is pledged to Serbia, but up to date it has received but $1,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is a very small credit. Three million dollars in this time of vast expenditure would not do anything for war purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would not, for reasons which I have stated, discuss Serbia any more than I would discuss any other nation coming to us for assistance, but I say that the case of Serbia illustrates the ease with which foreign nations walk into the Treasury Department through accredited representatives, certified by the State Department, and secure money out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman that I do not ask, of course, and no Member of the House would want to ask, for any information which a member of the Committee on Ways and Means elicited at the hearings and considered ought to be kept inviolate, but $3,000,000 of war credit, even if the money had been advanced, would not amount to very much for war purposes; and I think that any money loaned by this Government to those belligerent countries, or any one of them, must be for urgent war purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The statement of the Secretary of the Treasury, as to all these loans, is in substance that an accredited commissioner or ambassador walks into his office and states that his Government needs the money, and that upon those representations the loan is made. All that the Secretary of the Treasury has to justify the loan is—first, the loan law; second, the certificate of the Secretary of State that the commissioner or ambassador is duly accredited and empowered to make this request; and then the approval of the President to the making of the loan.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman mean to say all that is implied in that statement, that all that is necessary to secure all these millions from the Public Treasury was for the accredited representative of one of those Governments to go into the Treasury of the United States and say that his country needed the money, and he would get it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is substantially the fact, as developed before the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Permit me one other question right there. Was there not any evidence submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means more than is implied in the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that these accredited representatives came in, for instance, the representative of Serbia, stating that Serbia needed $3,000,000, got a balance, and received a million dollars in money?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The formality gone through with is just as I stated it. The commissioner or the ambassador is accredited, as it were, using diplomatic language, by the Secretary of State, and comes to the Secretary of the Treasury; the credentials being correct the Secretary of the Treasury, having the power and the sole power, except as to the approval of the President, makes the loan. He gives, first, the credit for the amount that the foreign Government desires and then they loan as much actual cash upon the credit as may be immediately available or as may be desired. And it might be added that it is expected that much of the money shall be spent in the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What did the representative put up by way of security?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is no security except the obligation to give bonds of Serbia or any other like country—bonds of equal denomination with those of the United States upon which this money is raised.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Serbia procured the money without bonds?

Mr. FORDNEY. She gave a demand note for such time as might remain, or for a longer time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Amplifying the answer of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], I observe that we asked the Secretary of the Treasury to produce one of the demand notes for the inspection of the committee, and there was something in it referring to the law, so that the Secretary is throwing himself back of the law, properly, as I assume. But with further reference to the making of these loans and with regard to the sole discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, I wish to say this, there was very little evidence before the committee as to the actual needs of the foreign nations borrowing this money. We do not know much about the particulars. The Secretary of the Treasury frankly stated that when these accredited representatives came along in due form he could not very well question their good faith, and that there was little he could do under the law except to make the loan.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. May I ask the gentleman if in his judgment the law does not require that the bonds should be on hand before the money was paid over?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not so sure about that. But the Secretary protects himself by these preliminary certificates, and the conditions are written therein. It is to be an exchange of bonds eventually, and we are to be on equal terms—what might, in plain American parlance, be called "fifty-fifty." They are to give us bonds for our bonds of like denominations. And there is another question affecting the Secretary of the Treasury, if I may be permitted to proceed another minute—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I want to ask just one more question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did not the law require, not the handing over of a demand note by the accredited representative but the transfer of bonds at the time the cash was paid out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will repeat what I read a moment ago from the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury as to these obligations taken at the time the credit is given. I read:

Mr. MOORE. They are preparatory to the delivery of their bonds?

Secretary McADOO. They are short-time or demand obligations, which will be converted into bonds.

Mr. MOORE. And they remain in the Treasury here at Washington?

Secretary McADOO. Yes, sir.

So that when the time comes for the exchange of these bonds these preliminary certificates or short-time demand obligations will be given back.

Now, I will not discuss Serbia, or England, or France, or Belgium, or Italy, or any other of these countries that have been receiving loans in this way, except to say that when a government changes its form, perhaps to the extent of a revolutionary change, the value of its securities may be affected; and in the case of a great country, one of the greatest on earth, if its government should be changed from a monarchical to a democratic form of government, it is just possible that there may be some danger in leaving to the sole discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, whether he be a Republican or a Democrat, now or a hundred years hence, the right to say whether, by a conversion or a juggling of bonds on a fifty-fifty basis, bonds of an overthrown monarchical government which may be worthless, or of a temporary revolutionary government, shall enter into the exchange.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And it may be, in the case of one of these governments, or any of them, that the bonds that we take to-day, or the bonds that private citizens of the United States took and which may have depreciated, could be practically redeemed under a system conferring too much discretion as to loans and purchases, conversions and sales, upon any one authority.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think the gentleman answered the question propounded to him by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. If I understood his statement, it was to the effect that if a foreign ambassador should walk into the office of the Secretary of the Treasury and say, "My Government needs $100,000,000," the Secretary of the Treasury would loan him that money upon his statement, without any evidence that the ambassador on behalf of his Government was authorized to negotiate the loan. Is that what the gentleman wants the House to understand?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want the House to understand—

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now, is that correct?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Let me state it in my own way.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, I wish the gentleman would answer my question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not criticizing the Secretary of the Treasury for the manner in which these loans are made. I am speaking of the system as it was explained to the committee and of the discretion lodged with the Secretary.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does the Secretary of the Treasury make these loans without any evidence that the ambassador has authority from his Government to ask the loan?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I made no suggestion that the Secretary of the Treasury made loans without proper authority.

Mr. ALEXANDER. From the Government to whom the loan is made.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think I made it clear.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I wanted it made clear. I do not think you have made it clear so far.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have stated it three or four times. I have endeavored to make it clear that if the foreign commissioner, say Lord Northcliffe, for the British Government, or the ambassador, Mr. Bakhmétéff, for the Russian Government, should come to the Secretary of the Treasury properly accredited by his Government, then the Secretary of the Treasury would extend him the credit; and I will say this to the credit of the Secretary—

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is the first time the gentleman has said that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; the gentleman from Missouri does me an injustice. I have said it several times.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am sorry. I would be glad to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. GARNER. I know that the gentleman always appears to be willing to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will get me the time I will try to answer his question. I ask unanimous consent for one minute to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. I am not particularly anxious to ask the gentleman this question, except he says he has no desire to criticize the method by which the Secretary of the Treasury has made these loans; and yet he does say, or convey the idea, that the Secretary of the Treasury has not made as extensive an investigation as to the necessities of these Governments as he ought to have made. Let me ask this question now: Did not the gentleman from Pennsylvania cross-examine the Secretary of the Treasury when he was before our committee?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did; and I wish all his answers were here.

Mr. GARNER. Did not the Secretary of the Treasury convince the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he had exhausted every resource at his command to ascertain the necessities of these foreign Governments?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In answer to that, I will say that the Secretary of the Treasury made a very favorable impression upon me as to his ability, as to his keenness, and as to his desire to do what was right.

Mr. GARNER. The question I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania is this, If the Secretary of the Treasury did not say, and if he did not convince the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he had used every effort possible to secure all the information possible as to the necessities of these various Governments?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will answer that by asking the gentleman this: Has the Secretary of the Treasury in any individual case stated the reasons given by any ambassador or commissioner as to why his Government desired a particular loan?

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of the Treasury did convince me that he had made every effort possible to get all the information possible concerning the necessities of these Governments before he made these loans.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman knows that the Secretary of the Treasury did not tell in detail the reasons given by the ambassadors who applied for the loans.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania no doubt intended and tried to be exactly accurate in his reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]. He says that the Secretary of the Treasury stated before the committee that if the representative of a foreign Government, duly accredited, came to the Secretary of the Treasury and said that he needed so much money, the Secretary of the Treasury said he had nothing else to do than to make the loan if he was able to loan the money, because he had to take the word of the representative of the foreign Government as to the necessity for the loan. I want to read into the Record exactly what the Secretary of the Treasury did state before the committee, on page 13 of his testimony, concerning the making of these loans to the foreign Governments:

My judgment in making these loans to the different powers is determined very largely by what they represent as their actual necessities for the purchase of supplies and materials and other requirements in carrying on the war. If a foreign country says, "We should like to borrow, and we actually need, $185,000,000 for the month of September," I get all the light I can upon the reasons for her necessities, and if I determine that I can make the loan I then submit it to the President, discuss it with him, and, if he approves, I notify them that I shall lend them $185,000,000 for the month of September.

Why, he does everything any committee appointed by the Speaker or the Senate or anybody else could do. He ascertains all the facts with reference to the necessities of the Government. He gets all the light he can, by all the means he can, from the representatives of the Government. If we had a committee we would not send it to Europe or Great Britain to find out how they expended their money and what kind of supplies they were getting. We would have to get all the testimony upon which to base the action of the House from the representatives of that Government. We might cross-examine them all we pleased.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETT. Did the Secretary of the Treasury impart to the Ways and Means Committee any of this light so that the committee could pass its judgment on the wisdom of the decision of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; we did not ask him that under the circumstances, because there were others present.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, the gentleman from North Carolina has stated practically what I set out to say. I want to do the Secretary of the Treasury justice. From his statement to the committee I say that he did everything that an honorable man was expected to do in making these loans to the allies. He stated that when our Secretary of State notified him that foreign representatives were properly commissioned to negotiate these loans with our Government, he took it for granted that their authority was correct and supreme. He, together with the President, talked the matter over with the representatives of the foreign Government as to the amount of money to be loaned to each one of the Governments out of the proceeds of the last sale of the liberty bonds, and he gave to the committee the sums loaned. I have not the figures present, but he gave to each member of the committee the amount of money he, with the President, had decided to loan to each one of the foreign Governments—England, France, Italy, and Russia.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Members will find that on page 10 of the hearings.

Mr. FORDNEY. Certain amounts have been placed by our Government at the disposal of these various foreign Governments, to be paid over to them on demand. And until such time as he can determine with the representatives of these foreign Governments as to the length of time that bonds shall be given to our Government for these loans, he has taken from each one of the foreign Governments demand notes, the same to be surrendered on delivery by their Government to our Government of the bonds finally decided upon.

I remember that $275,000,000 has been decided upon to be loaned to Russia. Russia had called for $87,500,000 of that money, $45,000,000 of which the Russian Government has agreed shall remain in the hands of our Government to meet the payment of an order for 10,000 railway cars and, I think, 500 locomotives placed with people of this country, to be manufactured and delivered in the future, and on the delivery of those cars, or upon the shipment of them to Russia, our Government is to pay over the amount of that contract to our manufacturers.

As to each and every one of the foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury thoroughly convinced me he is proceeding in a proper manner.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not want to be very technical in this matter or indulge in anything in the way of harsh criticism of this administration, but if the gentleman will permit me, under the law of April 24, 1917, under which bonds were issued, it is provided in section 2:

The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized on behalf of the United States to purchase at par from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligation hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States under the authority of this act.

Now then, that law is express in conferring upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power and the power only, is it not, to purchase at par obligations already issued of the belligerent Governments in their terms corresponding with the terms of the obligations of the Government of the United States. Is there any doubt about that?

Does the gentleman think that is a fair compliance with that mandatory statute providing for the purchase of obligations like our own obligations? Does he think it is right to take a demand note from an accredited agent?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do, for this reason: The Secretary of the Treasury as yet has not been able to determine the length of time and the exact date of payment for which he wishes those foreign bonds to be issued.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Had he any right to advance money until he did know?

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask the gentleman to wait for a minute. When that time is determined that those bonds shall run—and he stated he wanted those bonds to fall due just a little before our bonds fall due which we issue in this country to secure the money to loan to the allies—then he will call for their long-time bonds. It is utterly impossible for him to get those foreign bonds immediately upon making this loan, and to secure this Government until he does get the final bonds he takes a demand note which is good if anything given by these Governments is good. Therefore I think he has fully complied with the provisions of the law. I would think so if I were in his place.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman think that a promissory note signed by a representative of the Government meets the plain provisions of that law which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to take an obligation of the Government in terms practically identical with the terms of the bonds of the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. If your promissory note or your short-time due bill is not good, your long-time bond is not good. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. That is the question, and he is taking those short-time notes until he can determine the due date he wants fixed in the long-time bonds. They are convertible, to be sure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I only ask for two minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then make it five.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Michigan be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think the gentleman's answer would have been apropos if he had said they gave this promissory note to us and that we were to deliver the money when they turned the bonds in and the promissory note was condition upon that, but where the statute says that he can purchase only obligations of these belligerent countries bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under the authority of this act, it strikes me that in taking the promissory note he has not complied with the plain letter of the law.

Mr. FORDNEY. I think it a compliance with the law as far as it is possible for our Government to comply with the law.
